showing its relation to the law. The reader is left with the impression, common among learned men who have a wide knowledge of the data concerning religion but little acquaintance with its substance, that religion has been superseded by science. We are left to believe that its effect on the law has given way to the effect of science, and this to the good of mankind. The reviewer ventures the opinion that thought about the material aspect of the universe is already proving an insufficient model for legal thought; that justice, like religion, is a thing of the spirit; and that the one cannot be realized apart from the other. However, that is a matter of opinion; and the outlook of the author is at least in the mental style of the times.
