2006

Taking State Property Rights Out of Federal Labor Law

Jeffrey M. Hirsch
University of North Carolina School of Law, jmhirsch@email.unc.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://scholarship.law.unc.edu/faculty_publications

Part of the Law Commons
Publication: Boston College Law Review

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Faculty Scholarship at Carolina Law Scholarship Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty Publications by an authorized administrator of Carolina Law Scholarship Repository. For more information, please contact law_repository@unc.edu.
Abstract: The National Labor Relations Board's current analysis of union organizers' right to access employer property relies heavily on an employer's right to exclude under state property law. If the employer possesses this right, an attempt to exclude organizers is generally lawful; if the employer lacks this right, the attempt is unlawful. This scheme makes little sense doctrinally, as an employer's property interests are usually irrelevant to the issue that should be the Board's primary concern—whether the removal of union organizers interferes with employees' federal labor rights. I propose eliminating consideration of state property rights from right-to-access cases. Instead, the Board should focus on whether the manner in which an employer excludes organizers chills employee rights, while property issues—such as a trespass claim against organizers—should be determined by state courts. The proposal includes presumptions to guide employer conduct, providing clarity for all parties, better protecting employees' labor rights, and freeing the Board from its struggles with state property law.

Introduction

Imagine that you are the manager of a restaurant located, along with several other businesses, on the first floor of a high-rise building. One afternoon, just before a shift change, several members of a local union stand on the sidewalk near the entrance to the restaurant and distribute flyers to employees encouraging them to join the union. The handbilling is peaceful and does not block the entrance. In the past, the owner has emphasized that solicitors are not welcome and you are confident that union organizing would not be an exception. What should you do?
If you are a typical manager, you would immediately tell the organizers to leave and, if they refuse, pursue other means—such as calling the police or security personnel—to stop the organizing. By doing so, however, you put your employer at risk of violating the National Labor Relations Act (the “Act” or the “NLRA”).¹ Currently, the only way of knowing whether a violation occurred is to wait for the National Labor Relations Board (the “Board” or the “NLRB”) to resolve the dispositive issue in almost all such cases: whether the employer had a state property right to exclude the organizers.² But even if you were one of the rare managers who was aware of that rule, it often would provide little help when faced with organizing activity. You must know whether your employer or the building owner controls or owns the sidewalk. Although the lease likely would provide the answer, few managers would have immediate access to that document. If the building owner controls the sidewalk, you could ask her to remove the organizers, but her right to do so is not clear. For instance, even if the building owner built, maintains, and even owns the sidewalk, she may have obtained the property from the city with conditions requiring public access. Or, as is likely, there may be a public right-of-way on the sidewalk. Yet, different states allow varying degrees of control and public access over such easements.³

These questions are not far-fetched. Rather, they signify a fairly common set of issues in Board right-to-access cases.⁴ Not surprisingly, the Board—whose official expertise is solely the administration of the NLRA—is not well-suited to decide issues of state property law. The result is delay, poor administration of the NLRA, and possible interference with state property rights. Therefore, this Article proposes a rule that eliminates the issue of state property law from the Board’s right-to-access cases and, instead, focuses on the manner in which the employer tried to remove the organizers. In short, the Board no longer would consider state property rights. Instead, it would presume that an employer’s peaceful request to stop organizing activity on what appears to be its property is lawful, and presume that any action going beyond such a request violates the NLRA. This change would provide both organizers and employers clarity in understanding the consequences of their actions. Moreover, the proposal would allow for better enforcement of federal labor rights and eliminate a source of federal encroachment on state property law.

² See NLRB v. Calkins, 187 F.3d 1080, 1088 (9th Cir. 1999); Snyder’s of Hanover, Inc., 334 N.L.R.B. 183, 185 (2001).
³ Moreover, state property law may limit property owners’ ability to exclude organizers under theories such as consent or privilege. See Restatement (Second) of Torts §§ 10, 892A (1965).

Although concern for property interests vis-à-vis government regulation has been strong for several decades, the U.S. Supreme Court's 2005 public use decision in Kelo v. City of New London set off a storm of popular criticism indicating that this concern may be growing. That potential growth is significant, as attempts to protect property rights already have imposed substantial limits on the enforcement of various areas of law, particularly labor. In a series of Supreme Court holdings, private property rights were used to circumscribe the Board's ability to protect federal labor rights. Ironically, however, the Board's attempt to follow this Court precedent harms property interests through the delay and inexpert judgments that one would expect from a federal labor agency's interpretation of state law.

The problem with the Board's current analysis is more prevalent and serious than one might imagine. Many employers have worksites that are on or near property that they do not fully control; for instance, a mall employer may lack control over nearby walkways and parking lots, as well as the store property itself. Moreover, states have widely

5 See infra notes 159-78 and accompanying text.

6 As early as 1965, Professor William Gould—prior to becoming NLRB Chairman—noted that, although "subject to reasonable use in other areas of the law, curiously the concept of property rights has become a rallying cry in the field of labor law" that traditionally provided "an absolute defense against those who would engage in union activity." William B. Gould, Union Organizational Rights and the Concept of "Quasi-Public" Property, 49 MINN. L. REV. 505, 509 (1965).

7 See generally 545 U.S. 469 (2005).

9 As stated by Professor Cynthia Estlund, "[t]he history of labor law has been, in large measure, the history of property rights." Cynthia L. Estlund, Labor; Property, and Sovereignty After Lechmere, 46 STAN. L. REV. 305, 306 (1994); see supra note 6.

11 See infra notes 86-155 and accompanying text.

12 See Venetian Casino Resort, L.L.C. v. Local Joint Executive Bd., 257 F.3d 937, 942-48, 946 (9th Cir. 2001) (holding that employer lacked right to exclude from sidewalk that it built on its private property, based on terms of agreement with city to widen road in front of casino); UFCW v. NLRB (Farm Fresh), 222 F.3d 1030, 1034-37 (D.C. Cir. 2000) (noting that employer's no-solicitation rule applied to entrances of mall stores with different leases.
differing laws regulating the use of certain types of property. Pennsylvania, for example, allows public use of a public right-of-way only to the extent that the activity is expressly authorized by the relevant municipality, and permits an abutting landowner to exclude any unauthorized activity. In contrast, New Jersey affirmatively provides the limited right to enter private property to gain access to employees residing there. California courts currently are unable to agree on the extent to which the state permits union access to private property. In sum, the complexity of state property law has bewildered the Board, which focuses on federal labor law. Perhaps more importantly, the complexity has created grave uncertainty for both employers and organizers, who cannot know whether their actions will violate the NLRA until the culmination of years of confusing and protracted litigation.

This Article’s proposal seeks to eliminate that confusion by removing state property law issues from the Board’s docket. Even under the Court’s current right-to-access jurisprudence, an employer’s state property rights are generally distinct from federal labor interests. Thus, the proposal intends to shift the Board’s attention away from state property law to where it belongs: the effect of an employer’s exclusion of organizers on its employees’ ability to exercise their rights under the NLRA. The Board’s failure to distinguish these two distinct rights of employers and employees has led to the quagmire in which it now finds itself. The proposal would free the Board, and federal courts of appeals, from the burden of having to delve into state property law issues, in which neither possesses expertise. It also would provide states better control over providing varying levels of control, and positing that state would recognize “something akin to an implied easement of necessity” for lessee/employer); Weis Mkt., Inc., 325 N.L.R.B. 871, 883–84 (1998) (concluding that Pennsylvania law does not give employer right to exclude union picketers because it had right to use common areas), enforcement denied in relevant part, 265 F.3d 239 (4th Cir. 2001); Victory Mkt., Inc., 322 N.L.R.B. 17, 20, 21 (1996) (finding picketing near mall parking lot entrance properly halted where “record [did] not clearly establish whether the handbillers were standing on public or private property”); O’Neil’s Mkt., Inc., 318 N.L.R.B. 646, 649–50 (1995) (concluding that employer lacked right to exclude under state law, despite maintenance of parking lot under lease), enforced in relevant part, 95 F.3d 733 (8th Cir. 1996). Other examples include entrances or driveways to a worksite that are subject to some public use. See Johnson & Hardin Co. v. NLRB, 49 F.3d 237, 239 (6th Cir. 1995) (discussing union handbilling on state property over which employer possessed easement).

13 See, e.g., Waremart Foods v. NLRB, 354 F.3d 870, 874 (D.C. Cir. 2004); Snyder’s of Hanover, Inc. v. NLRB, 39 F. App’x 730, 734 (3d Cir. 2002); State v. Shack, 277 A.2d 369, 374–75 (N.J. 1971).

14 See infra notes 117–123 and accompanying text.

15 Shack, 277 A.2d at 374–75.

16 See infra notes 133–152 and accompanying text.
their own property law, while conserving valuable Board and federal court resources. Further, the proposal would drastically lessen the uncertainty for both employers and organizers in right-to-access cases. Under the proposal, the parties would likely know ex ante whether the Board would find their conduct permissible, rather than remaining uncertain pending litigation. The result would be right-to-access disputes that are more peaceful and less likely to infringe employees’ NLRA rights, and thus, less litigation.

Part I of this Article discusses the current right-to-access scheme’s development and critiques the Board’s interpretation of Supreme Court precedent. Part II describes the proposal and its presumptions’ application to typical factual scenarios. Finally, Part III shows why Board enforcement of the proposal would not constitute an unconstitutional taking.

I. CURRENT RIGHT-TO-ACCESS ANALYSIS

The NLRB’s current right-to-access analysis has developed from the 1956 U.S. Supreme Court decision in NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co. Subsequent cases, in particular the Supreme Court decision in Lechmere, Inc. v. NLRB, analyzed organizers’ right to access employer property under the theory that nonemployee labor interests were inferior to employee interests in a majority of circumstances. However, the NLRB has struggled to apply Lechmere’s employee/nonemployee distinction. Where nonemployee organizers seek access, the NLRB now relies on whether an employer has a state private property right entitling it to exclude nonemployee labor organizers. This current analysis makes little sense practically or doctrinally, as it requires a federal agency specializing in labor law to determine complicated state property law issues and it focuses on property rights more than warranted under Lechmere.

A. The Road to Lechmere

The starting point for the Board’s current right-to-access analysis is the U.S. Supreme Court’s 1956 decision in Babcock.17 At issue in Babcock were employer refusals to allow nonemployee union organizers to distribute literature in company parking lots.18 The NLRB had con-

18 Id. at 106. Although this Article refers to “nonemployees” as individuals who are not employees of the targeted employer, the NLRA protects “any employee,” including employees of a union or nontargeted employer. See 29 U.S.C. § 152(3) (2000); see also Eastex, cluded that the refusals violated section 8(a)(1) of the NLRA by “unreasonably impeding” employees’ right to self-organization.\textsuperscript{19} The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the employer’s private property rights trumped the union’s organizational rights.\textsuperscript{20}

The Board had found that the refusals to allow distribution of union literature were unlawful because the workplace was the most effective location for employees to receive information necessary to choose freely whether to organize.\textsuperscript{21} That finding was based on the Supreme Court’s Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB line of cases, which held that employers generally cannot restrict discussion of self-organization among employees during non-work time.\textsuperscript{22} The 1945 Republic Aviation decision was one of the earliest Supreme Court cases addressing the tension between employees' federal labor rights and employers’ right to control use of their property.\textsuperscript{23} Although, under certain circumstances, the exercise of labor rights trumped property rights under Republic Aviation and its progeny, employers’ property interests fared much better in Babcock eleven years later.\textsuperscript{24}

The Babcock Court rejected the Board’s reliance on Republic Aviation, holding that its limitations on employers’ property interests did not apply to nonemployee conduct.\textsuperscript{25} Although employees had a di\textsuperscript{19} Babcock, 351 U.S. at 106. Section 7 of the NLRA protects employees’ right to “self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.” 29 U.S.C. § 157. Those rights are enforced through section 8(a)(1), which provides that “[i]t shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise” of their section 7 rights. Id. § 158(a)(1). An employer violates section 8(a)(1) when its conduct tends to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their section 7 rights. See Retlaw Broad. Co. v. NLRB, 53 F.3d 1002, 1006 (9th Cir. 1995).

\textsuperscript{20} Babcock, 351 U.S. at 112–14.

\textsuperscript{21} Id. at 107. The exclusions were made pursuant to non-solicitation policies that were not enforced solely against unions. Id.

\textsuperscript{22} Id. at 110, 113 (citing LeTourneau Co., 54 N.L.R.B. 1253, 1262 (1944), aff’d sub nom. Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793 (1945); Peyton Packing Co., 49 N.L.R.B. 828, 843–44 (1943)); see also TeleTech Holdings, Inc., 333 N.L.R.B. 402, 403 (2001) (“A no-distribution rule which is not restricted to working time and to work areas is overly broad and presumptively unlawful.”). Exceptions always have been made for production or disciplinary reasons. See Babcock, 351 U.S. at 110.

\textsuperscript{23} See Estlund, supra note 9, at 307 & n.6, 347 (citing commentators and noting that Republic Aviation essentially created an employee forum at work, as long as discussion did not occur on work time and in work areas).

\textsuperscript{24} See Babcock, 351 U.S. at 112–13; supra note 22 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{25} Babcock, 351 U.S. at 111, 113 (citing NLRB v. Seamprufe, Inc., 222 F.2d 858, 860 (10th Cir. 1955); NLRB v. Lake Superior Lumber Corp., 167 F.2d 147, 150 (6th Cir. 1948))
rect right—a right that the Act explicitly grants to them—to discuss self-organization at their workplace, nonemployee union organizers did not. The only right nonemployee organizers possessed was a "derivative" right to discuss unionization with employees. A derivative right is not expressly protected by the Act and exists only as a means to foster employees' exercise of their direct rights; in Babcock, the union had a derivative right to inform employees about self-organization, a prerequisite for employees' exercise of their direct right to choose freely whether to pursue collective representation.

Despite its acknowledgement of the derivative right to communicate with employees, the Court severely limited organizers' ability to exercise that right in the face of employer resistance. According to the Court, an employer's exclusion of nonemployee organizers from employer property is permissible if "reasonable efforts by the union through other available channels of communication will enable it to reach the employees with its message and the employer's notice or order does not discriminate against the union by allowing other distribution."

This rule, by itself, could have struck an equal balance between labor rights and property interests, but the Court's definition of a reasonable alternative favored the latter. In particular, the Court—dis-

(noting that several federal courts of appeals had relied on this distinction, which the Court held to be one of "substance").

26 Babcock, 351 U.S. at 113.
27 Id. ("The right to self-organization depends in some measure on the ability of employees to learn the advantages of self-organization from others."); see Gould, supra note 6, at 512-13 (describing importance of union-employee contact at workplace). But see R. Wayne Estes & Adam M. Porter, Babcock/Lechmere Revisited: Derivative Nature of Union Organizers' Right of Access to Employers' Property Should Impact Judicial Evaluation of Alternatives, 48 SMU L. Rev. 349, 354-56 & n.3 (1995) (citing and supporting criticism of Babcock's employee/nonemployee distinction).
28 Babcock, 351 U.S. at 113.
29 Id. at 112.
30 Id. at 112; see Jay Gresham, Note, Still as Strangers: Nonemployee Organizers on Private Commercial Property, 62 Tex. L. Rev. 111, 115-22 (1983) (describing development of reasonable alternatives analysis). Previously, an employer could not exclude organizers from its property if, for example, the property was an in-store public restaurant and the organizing activity was only an "incident to the normal use of" the restaurant. See Montgomery Ward & Co., 288 N.L.R.B. 126, 127 (1988). The Board, however, has overruled that precedent as unsustainable under Lechmere, Inc. v. NLRB, 502 U.S. 527, 537-38 (1992). See Farm Fresh, Inc., 326 N.L.R.B. 997, 999 (1998) (overruling Montgomery Ward and rejecting dissent's argument that it survives Lechmere because it was based on the antidiscrimination exception to employer's right to exclude), petition for review granted on different grounds sub nom. UFCW v. NLRB (Farm Fresh), 222 F.3d 1030 (D.C. Cir. 2000).
31 See Babcock, 351 U.S. at 111-12.
agreeing with the Board—held that contacting employees in public and at their homes through the telephone, letters, and meetings were reasonable alternatives to worksite communications. Because these alternate methods were available to the union, the employer could lawfully stop the parking lot distributions.

The Court acknowledged that the alternatives available to the union in Babcock provided a close question because the balance between employers' property rights and employees' organization rights "must be obtained with as little destruction of one as is consistent with the maintenance of the other." Nonetheless, the Court suggested that its concern for employees' rights did not extend far. In noting that the plants at issue were close to "well-settled" communities, the Court expressly recognized nonemployees' right to access employer property only in the very limited circumstances in which both the workplace and employees' living quarters were beyond the union's reach—such as a remote logging camp.

For several decades following Babcock, the NLRB attempted to reconcile the Court decision with its right-to-access analysis. Finally, in its 1988 decision in Jean Country, the Board settled upon a test that it believed to be consistent with Babcock. The Board read Babcock and intervening Supreme Court decisions as requiring the accommodation of both property and labor rights to reflect the strength of the two interests in a given case. The test, therefore, balanced "the degree of impairment of the [employees'] Section 7 right if access should be denied" with "the degree of impairment of the [employer's] private property right if access should be granted." Thus, if the prop-

---

52 Id. at 111.
53 Id. at 112.
54 Id.
55 Id.
57 See Fairmont Hotel Co., 282 N.L.R.B. 139, 140-42 (1986); Estlund, supra note 9, at 316-19 (discussing post-Babcock development of Board law).
59 See Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507, 522 (1976) (holding that accommodation between section 7 and property rights "may fall at differing points along the spectrum depending on the nature and strength of the respective ... rights asserted in any given context"); Cent. Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 407 U.S. 539, 543 (1972) (holding that Board's role is to seek proper accommodation between section 7 rights and private property rights).
60 Jean Country, 291 N.L.R.B. at 12, 14.
61 Id. The Board also emphasized that the Court had extended its Babcock rule to right-to-access cases that involved non-organizational activity. Id.
Taking State Property Rights out of Federal Labor Law

Property is not generally open to the public, then an employer's attempt to exclude will be more likely lawful. Moreover, a significant factor in determining the impairment of labor rights was the "availability of reasonably effective alternative means" of reaching the intended audience. According to the Board, the availability of newspapers, the radio, or television would constitute reasonable alternatives to direct contact only in exceptional cases.

The Jean Country test reflected the Board's regular practice of balancing employee and employer interests. The balance struck by the Jean Country test, however, was short-lived. In its 1992 decision in Lechmere, the U.S. Supreme Court eliminated virtually any notion of balance by deeming nonemployee labor interests inferior to employer property rights in all but the most extraordinary circumstances.

In Lechmere, a union attempted to organize the employees of a retail store located in an open shopping mall. After a full-page newspaper advertisement elicited little response, organizers placed handbills on cars parked in the mall lot most used by the store's employees. The mall owner immediately told the organizers to leave, citing its no-solicitation and handbilling rule. After their subsequent handbilling attempts prompted the same response, the organizers moved to a nearby strip of public land and distributed handbills to cars entering and exiting the parking lot before the mall opened and after it closed. The handbilling, in addition to contacting employees via the state's license plate database, yielded only one employee-signed card seeking union representation.

The NLRB, acting on the union's unfair labor practice charge alleging that the mall owner unlawfully barred the organizational activity from its property, applied the Jean Country test and found a viola-

---

42 Id. at 14, 16.
43 Id. at 14; see id. at 13 (discussing other factors, such as the section 7 right at issue, type of property at issue, identity of target audience, possibility of affecting neutral employers, dilution of message, and costs of alternative means).
44 Jean Country, 291 N.L.R.B. at 13 (citing NLRB v. United Aircraft Corp., 324 F.2d 128, 130 (2d Cir. 1963) (emphasizing superiority of direct contact and noting high costs of media alternatives)).
46 502 U.S. at 537-38.
47 Id. at 529-30.
48 Id.
49 Id. at 530 & n.1.
50 Id. at 530.
51 Lechmere, 502 U.S. at 530.
tion of section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit enforced the Board’s order. The Supreme Court reversed, however, holding that the Jean Country test was impermissible under the NLRA.

Although the Court recognized that nonemployee organizers possessed derivative section 7 rights, it emphasized Babcock’s distinction between employees’ right to discuss unionism among themselves and nonemployee attempts to inform employees about unionism. According to the Court, under Babcock, “an employer cannot be compelled to allow distribution of union literature by nonemployee organizers on his property” unless no reasonable alternatives are available to the organizers. Despite acknowledging its own line of cases citing Babcock’s emphasis that both employee and employer rights should be accommodated, the Court held that this precedent did not curb “Babcock’s holding that an employer need not accommodate nonemployee organizers unless the employees are otherwise inaccessible.”

The Lechmere Court’s interpretation of Babcock struck down the Board’s Jean Country balancing test. Where, as in Republic Aviation, an employer attempts to prevent employee-only discussions, the Court conceded the Board’s authority to balance employees’ right to discuss unionization against an employer’s right to control use of its property. Where communication with nonemployees is involved, however, “the Board [is] not permitted to engage in that same balancing.” Rather, the Lechmere Court construed Babcock as proscribing any balancing or accommodation of nonemployees’ derivative right to 52 Lechmere, Inc., 295 N.L.R.B. 92, 94, 98–99 (1988) (concluding also that attempts to exclude union from public property were unlawful), enforced, 914 F.2d 313 (1st Cir. 1990), rev’d, 502 U.S. 527 (1992).

---

53 Lechmere, 914 F.2d at 325.
54 Lechmere, 502 U.S. at 538.
55 Id. at 532.
56 Id. at 533, 537; see supra notes 25–28 and accompanying text; see also infra note 67.
57 Lechmere, 502 U.S. at 533–34.
58 Id. at 534–35 (citing Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. San Diego County Dist. Council of Carpenters, 496 U.S. 180, 205 (1978); Hudgens, 424 U.S. at 521–22 (“The locus of that accommodation . . . may fall at differing points along the spectrum depending on the nature and the strength of the respective § 7 rights and private property rights asserted in any given context.”); Cent. Hardware, 407 U.S. at 544; Babcock, 351 U.S. at 112 (holding that accommodation of different rights “must be obtained with as little destruction of one as is consistent with the maintenance of the other”).
59 Lechmere, 502 U.S. at 534.
60 Id. at 538.
61 Id. at 537.
62 Id.
contact employees as long as reasonable alternatives exist—"[i]t is only where access is infeasible that it becomes necessary and proper to take the accommodation inquiry to a second level, balancing the employees' and employers' rights.""63

_Lechmere_ has become the foundation for all subsequent right-to-access cases, in part because of its reaffirmation that nonemployees have a derivative right to discuss unionization with employees.64 More important, however, is its conclusion that this derivative right is vastly inferior to employees' direct right to discuss unionization.65 The _Lechmere_ Court's stated rationale for this disparity was simply that employee activity is fundamentally different from nonemployee conduct.66 The Court's failure to explain this distinction further is not surprising, as it is a difficult holding to defend.67

---

63 _Id._ at 537-38 (stating also that "reasonable" means anything that did not require "extraordinary feats to communicate with inaccessible employees"). In the face of _Lechmere_'s broad construction of reasonable means, others have noted that most alternatives are often vastly inferior to direct contact with employees at work. _See_ e.g., _Estes & Porter_, _supra_ note 27, at 363-66; _Estlund_, _supra_ note 9, at 332; Robert A. Gorman, _Union Access to Private Property_, 9 _Hofstra Lab. L.J._ 1, 22-23 (1992); Alan L. Zmija, _Union Organizing After Lechmere, Inc. v. NLRB—A Time to Reexamine the Rule of Babcock & Wilcox_, 12 _Hofstra Lab. L.J._ 65, 101 (1994). Moreover, one of the major alternatives cited in _Lechmere_—obtaining employee information from license plates—is now illegal under the federal Driver's Privacy Protection Act of 1994. _See_ 18 U.S.C. § 2724(a) (2000) (stating that it is generally unlawful to "knowingly obtain[.] . . . personal information, from a motor vehicle record"); Susan J. McGolrick, _Judge Rules UNITE HERE Violated Law by Using Cintas Workers' Vehicle Records_, 173 _Daily Lab. Rep._ (BNA) A-9 (2006) (discussing class action suit against union for obtaining home addresses from employee license plates). Eliminating that option further undermines _Lechmere_'s conclusion that alternative means, such as signs in a nearby public area or advertisements, would be sufficient to communicate with workers of a particular employer. _See_ _Lechmere_, 502 U.S. at 540.

64 _See_ _Lechmere_, 502 U.S. at 532; _see also_ _ITT Indus., Inc. v. NLRB_, 251 F.3d 995, 997 (D.C. Cir. 2001) (holding that derivative access rights result "entirely from on-site employees' § 7 organizational right to receive union-related information").

65 _Id._

66 _Id._

67 _Zmija, supra_ note 63, at 101 (criticizing employee/nonemployee distinction). The Board, _pre-Lechmere_, distinguished workers who were on an employer's property pursuant to a working relationship from individuals who were "strangers to the property." _See_ _S. Servs., Inc._, 300 N.L.R.B. 1154, 1155 (1990) (concluding that subcontractor's employee could not be barred from principal employer's property), _enforced_, 954 F.2d 700 (11th Cir. 1992). _But see_ _New York New York, LLC v. NLRB_, 315 F.3d 585, 589 (D.C. Cir. 2002) (questioning continued viability of _Southern Services after Lechmere_'s "express reaffirmation of the employee/nonemployee distinction"). _New York New York_ stated that the distinction works because section 7 provides employees with a limited property right to engage in organizational activity on their employer's property. 313 F.3d at 589. That right to organize means that employees are not trespassers; nonemployees, however, lack that right and are considered trespassers. _Id._ This begs the question, however, of why section 7 provides employees, but not nonemployees, that right. _See infra_ notes 72-81 and accompanying text.
The difference cannot be whether a trespass occurred, for both employee and nonemployee organizers can be trespassers. Nor can the distinction rely on employees' regular access to the employer's worksite, as nonemployees possess similar access to employer property regularly open to the public. One might think, given the context and reasoning of Babcock, that the distinction is based on derivative versus direct rights. The Board's post-Lechmere cases, however, make clear that nonemployee activity, even if directly protected by the NLRA, receives less protection vis-à-vis property rights than employee activity.

Lechmere did not address whether its analysis applied to non-organizational union activity in which, unlike organizing, unions have a direct right to engage, such as area standards, recognition, or publicity picketing. The Board ultimately concluded that Lechmere ap-

---

68 The Court, in a different context, has distinguished employees and nonemployees based on the argument that only nonemployees trespass. See Eastex, 437 U.S. at 571. But as then-Justice Rehnquist noted in dissent, the Republic Aviation employees could be considered trespassers if they violated the employer's conditions for entry. Id. at 581-82 n.2 (Rehnquist, J., dissenting); see also New York New York, 313 F.3d at 589 (noting that employee could be a trespasser because "conditional or restricted consent to enter land creates a privilege to do so only in so far as the condition or restriction is complied with" (quoting Restatement (Second) of Torts § 168 (1965))); First Healthcare Corp., 336 N.L.R.B. 646, 649 (2001) ("[A] ny employee engaged in activity to which the employer objects on its property, might be deemed a trespasser, not an invitee: the employer arguably is free to define the terms of its invitation to employees.").

70 See Montgomery Ward & Co. v. NLRB (Montgomery Ward II), 692 F.2d 1115, 1118 (7th Cir. 1982) (discussing right to exclude union organizers from employer's public cafeteria).

71 See ITT Indus., Inc. v. NLRB, 413 F.3d 64, 72-73 (D.C. Cir. 2005) (enforcing Board's conclusion that off-duty employee activity is covered by Republic Aviation because off-duty employees have "non-derivative" access rights); supra notes 25-28 and accompanying text. Another possible explanation is employees' economic dependency on their employer; thus, limits on employee discussions at the workplace more seriously threaten labor rights than limits on nonemployee activity. Cf. Gissel Packing, 395 U.S. at 617 (holding, with regard to employer threats, that Board must consider "the economic dependence of the employees on their employers, and the necessary tendency of the former . . . to pick up intended implications of the latter that might be more readily dismissed by a more disinterested ear"). The Board's failure to examine regularly the effect of employers' exclusionary activity on employee rights suggests that this concern does not underlie the current analysis.

plied to virtually all nonemployee activity, even conduct that is directly protected.\textsuperscript{73} According to the Board, the choice between the \textit{Lechmere} or \textit{Republic Aviation} analyses is based solely on whether employees or nonemployees were being excluded, no matter whether they were exercising a direct or derivative right.\textsuperscript{74} This conclusion rested on the Board’s view that, given \textit{Lechmere}’s refusal to protect nonemployee organizers, it would be incongruous to require greater access for non-employees engaged in non-organizational activity less respected by the NLRB.\textsuperscript{75} Thus, under the Board’s analysis, nearly all protected employee activity is shielded from employer interference pursuant to \textit{Re-Nonemployee conduct, whether directly or derivatively protected, is subject to employer interference under the Lechmere scheme.77

By refusing to focus on derive versus direct rights, the Board has put itself in a logical bind. The Board is constrained by the Court's statement that it gives directly protected nonemployee conduct, such as publicity picketing, less weight than nonemployee organizational activity.78 Yet, derivative/direct analysis would give the "weaker" non-organizational conduct, though a direct right, more protection against employer property interests than derivative, organizational activity.79 Rather than questioning the efficacy of this hierarchy rationale,80 the Board embraced a circular logic under which nonemployee organizational activity has little protection because it is a derivative right, and directly protected nonemployee conduct also lacks protection because the hierarchy places it below organizational activity. There may be good reasons for this employee/nonemployee analysis,81 but the Board has yet to express any.

This failure is all the more frustrating because the employee/nonemployee distinction is increasingly problematic in the modern workforce.82 The growing use of contractors, telecommuters, and other novel work relationships blurs the distinction between employees and nonemployees, particularly where access to property is at issue.83 Yet, no matter its justification, the employee/nonemployee

76 For a discussion of the confusion created by off-duty employees, see infra note 83 and accompanying text.
77 See Lechmere, 502 U.S. at 532.
78 Sears, 436 U.S. at 206 & n.42.
79 See supra note 75 and accompanying text.
80 The hierarchy theory does not fit well with Lechmere. If Lechmere was based upon a hierarchy of rights, Jean Country's balancing test—which expressly considered the strength of the section 7 interests at stake—should have been appropriate. Instead, Lechmere held that no balancing was required because the union's derivative rights were satisfied as long as reasonable alternatives existed. See Lechmere, 502 U.S. at 537-38. Moreover, although organizing activity is obviously a primary concern of the NLRA, the basis provided for the hierarchy distinction—that area standards, recognitional, and publicity activity were recognized later than organizational activity—makes little sense. The date a right was recognized under the Act should not govern the respective strength of that right.
81 See Hudgens, 424 U.S. at 521-22 n.10 (distinguishing nonemployee organizing from Republic Aviation employee activity because, under the former, "employer's management interests rather than his property interests were . . . involved," and this "difference is 'one of substance'" (quoting Babcock, 351 U.S. at 113)).
82 See infra note 83 and accompanying text.
83 For example, although a telecommuter may clearly be an employee, should she receive the same right to access a worksite as nontelecommuters? Also, should a contractor who works alongside other employees at a site be given the same access rights? See New York distinction is undeniably the basis for post-Lechmere right-to-access cases. The distinction's significance is critical because it suggests that the Board's primary consideration in right-to-access cases should be determining whether excluded organizers are employees, not the extent of the employer's property interests under state law. The Board's current analysis, however, has proved otherwise.

B. The Board's Current Analysis

The Board's struggle to apply Lechmere has led to a right-to-access analysis that makes little sense doctrinally or practically. The Board's approach generally consists of a single inquiry: did the employer possess a state private property right that entitled it to exclude the non-employee organizers? For most cases, if the employer possessed such a right, no violation of the NLRA occurred. If the employer lacked that right, then it automatically violated section 8(a)(1).

It makes little sense, however, to require the Board and reviewing federal courts of appeals to rest their decisions on an often complicated area of state law. The Board's expertise does not encompass state property issues and its treatment of those issues bears out that reality. The resulting delay and frequently inadequate analysis harms both the federal labor interests at stake and state property interests. Even beyond these practical concerns, the current analysis appears wrong as a matter

---

New York, 313 F.3d at 590 (holding that such an issue is uncertain because "[n]o Supreme Court case decides whether a contractor's employees have rights equivalent to the property owner's employees . . . because their worksite, although on the premises of another employer, is their sole place of employment"). Off-duty employees are another source of confusion. Currently, an employer is able to restrict off-duty employees' access only with respect to the inside of a facility or other working areas, where the restriction is clearly disseminated to employees, applies to all activities, and is justified by valid business reasons. See TeleTech Holdings, 333 N.L.R.B. at 404; Tri-County Med. Ctr., 222 N.L.R.B. 1089, 1089 (1976). In contrast to nonemployee organizers, the Board considers off-duty employees, even those who do not work at the site in question, to have a nonderivative right to access the property. See First Healthcare, 336 N.L.R.B. at 648; accord ITT Indus., 413 F.3d at 72–73. An employer's property concerns will be given more weight, however, where the off-duty employee works at a different site. First Healthcare, 336 N.L.R.B. at 650.

See supra notes 64–77 and accompanying text.

This Article generally refers to excluded activity as organizational. Although other nonemployee conduct may be involved and similarly analyzed, organizational activity is more common. See supra notes 72–81 and accompanying text.

See NLRB v. Calkins, 187 F.3d 1080, 1088 (9th Cir. 1999); Snyder's of Hanover, Inc., 334 N.L.R.B. 183, 185 (2001).

See Calkins, 187 F.3d at 1088; Snyder's of Hanover, 334 N.L.R.B. at 185.

See Calkins, 187 F.3d at 1088; Snyder's of Hanover, 334 N.L.R.B. at 185.

See infra notes 108–155 and accompanying text.
of law. Although ostensibly derived from Lechmere, the scheme runs counter to the analytical underpinnings of that decision. The proposal of this Article attempts to reconcile the right-to-access inquiry with Lechmere while also mitigating these practical concerns.

The Board's response to Lechmere was to create a strict dichotomy. Where nonemployee organizers are engaged in activity on property that the employer controls, Lechmere applies. In those circumstances, virtually any attempt by the employer to remove the organizers will be lawful, as long as reasonable alternatives to reach employees exist and the employer does not discriminatorily enforce its no-solicitation policy. The initial question for the Board, therefore, is whether state law gives the employer the right to remove the organizers from the property at issue.

The importance of this state law issue is heightened by the other side of the dichotomy. If the organizers are on property over which the employer lacks a right to exclude—a situation that Lechmere did not address—the Board has determined that the Lechmere analysis does not apply. Thus, virtually any attempt by the employer to remove organizers from such property automatically will be unlawful.

The significance of this analysis is its requirement that the Board address state property law in every case. That determination, moreover, is almost always dispositive. The Board's interpretation of a lease, construction of a state's treatment of public rights-of-way, or factual determination of where the organizers were standing will either trigger Lechmere and make the employer's attempt to exclude lawful, or evade Lechmere and make the exact same attempt unlawful. This analysis is frustrating for the parties, as they cannot reasonably predict, ex ante, the Board's determination of the state law issue.

In addition to the practical concerns raised by the Board's reliance on state law, its current dichotomy makes little sense under Lechmere. The problem does not lie with Lechmere's holding that employers can restrict access as long as reasonable alternative means to communicate with employees exist. Rather, the difficulty arises with the Board's categorical refusal to acknowledge the logic of this holding—if the existence of reasonable alternatives satisfies nonemployee organizers' derivative right to contact employees, then that right is satisfied no matter where organizing activity is located when the employer tries to stop it. The derivative-right analysis should be the same whether the organizers are standing on property that the employer controls or on property, such as the public grassy strip in Lechmere, over which the employer lacks control. Simply put, if reasonable alternatives exist that satisfy the organizers' derivative rights, no employer attempt to exclude them can infringe that right under Lechmere.

The Board's continued insistence that employers automatically violate section 8(a)(1) by excluding organizers from property over which they lack a right to exclude under state law purports to respect both state property law and federal labor law. In practice, however, neither interest is served. To be sure, property rights were a major concern of Lechmere. Yet if one takes seriously the Court's statement that "[section] 7 simply does not protect nonemployee union organizers except in the rare case where" reasonable alternatives

---

99 See 502 U.S. at 537–38.
100 See id.
101 See id. at 540.
102 See O’Neil’s Mktgs., 95 F.3d at 738–39; Bristol Farms, 311 N.L.R.B. at 437–38. The analysis reflects the Board’s view that Lechmere is applicable only where there is a conflict between employer property interests and labor rights. See Indio Grocery Outlet, 323 N.L.R.B. 1138, 1141 (1997), enforced sub nom. NLRB v. Calkins, 187 F.3d 1080 (9th Cir. 1999). As shown, however, Lechmere limited the scope of the union's derivative right—and, therefore, an employer's ability to interfere with that right—even where employer property interests are not present.
103 502 U.S. at 533–35, 537.
are unavailable, the Board's analysis is incorrect. Where section 7 does not protect union organizing, any employer interference with that activity is, by itself, lawful—no matter its location.

This Article concedes that Lechmere holding and argues that the Board, instead of looking to state property law, should focus on whether the manner in which an employer excludes organizing activity interferes with employees' right to choose freely whether to pursue collective representation. This proposal more accurately reflects Lechmere and avoids the myriad problems associated with the current practice of making an employer's state property rights dispositive. Indeed, the proposal would eliminate state law from the Board's analysis of right-to-access cases. The Board's past treatment of state property law shows that this change would benefit significantly the enforcement of federal labor rights, the administration of the Board and federal courts' adjudicatory processes, and the independence of state property law.

104 Id. at 537.
105 This concession is not an endorsement. Because Lechmere is likely to remain controlling precedent for the foreseeable future, this Article accepts it as settled law; however, the decision, particularly its extraordinarily broad view of "reasonable alternatives," has been widely criticized. See id. at 542-44 (White, J., dissenting) (arguing that Babcock's definition of reasonable efforts was not limited to remote logging camp situations); Estes & Porter, supra note 27, at 363-66 (criticizing holding that employee notice of organizational campaign satisfies derivative right); Estlund, supra note 9, at 332 (arguing that effective organizing requires worksite communication with employees); Gorman, supra note 63, at 12 (stating that "the Babcock & Wilcox Court did not at all state that the [reasonable alternatives] standard was well-nigh impossible to satisfy, as the Court now portrays it in Lechmere"); Zmija, supra note 63, at 113-16 (criticizing Lechmere's reasonable-alternatives test). But see Michael L. Stevens, Comment, The Conflict Between Union Access and Private Property Rights: Lechmere, Inc. v. NLRB and the Question of Accommodation, 41 EMORY L.J. 1917, 1940-47 (1992) (arguing that Lechmere properly rejected Jean Country's balancing approach and reasonable-alternatives analysis).

106 The Board, on occasion, has suggested that it would consider the effect of the employer excluding organizing activity on employees' general section 7 rights, but its analyses ultimately fail to provide any consideration of non-derivative rights. See Home Depot, U.S.A., Inc., 317 N.L.R.B. 732, 733 (1995) (stating issue as "whether the rights of employees were affected by the actions taken by" employer, but finding no effect wholly because employer possessed right to exclude organizer, employer did not deny employees access to union information, and employer did not discriminatorily apply no-solicitation rule).

107 The proposal would not leave union organizers without recourse. Rather, it would require the Board to look not to state property law, but to whether the employer's attempt to remove the union infringed on employees' labor rights. See infra notes 156-290 and accompanying text.
C. The Board’s Difficulties with State Property Law

Although the Board’s task in applying Lechmere is not enviable,108 its designation of state property law as the dispositive issue makes little sense. The Board’s expertise is solely in federal labor law and does not include the vagaries of over fifty different property regimes. It is not surprising, therefore, that Board resolution of these cases is much slower than other unfair labor practice decisions.109 The following two cases illustrate the reason for this delay, as well as the possibility of federal interference with state property law.

First, in Snyder’s of Hanover, Inc., a 2001 Board decision which the Third Circuit declined to enforce, the employer’s attempt to exclude union organizers from a public right-of-way located next to the entrance of its snack-food plant was at issue.110 Before arriving at the plant, the organizers called the state Department of Transportation and local township—both of which confirmed that the organizers could distribute handbills from the right-of-way.111 Subsequently, as the organizers distributed handbills to employees from the right-of-way, the employer demanded that the organizers leave and, after they refused, called the police.112 The responding officer contacted an assistant district attorney, who stated that the organizers had a right to handbill in the right-of-way as long as they were peaceful and did not interfere with traffic.113

The union subsequently filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board alleging that the employer violated section 8(a)(1) by prohibiting organizers from handbilling on the right-of-way and by

---

108 See Estlund, supra note 9, at 341.
109 The Board consistently takes substantially longer to decide Lechmere-related unfair labor practice cases than other unfair labor practice cases. The median number of days from the filing of the charge to a Board decision in Lechmere cases compared to all Board unfair labor practice cases (including Lechmere cases) over the most recently reported ten-year period is as follows: Fiscal Year 2004 (865 median days for Lechmere cases; 690 median days for all cases); FY2003 (1132 Lechmere, 647 all); FY2002 (812 Lechmere (only one case); 889 all); FY2001 (1502 Lechmere, 1144 all); FY2000 (1351 Lechmere, 878 all); FY1999 (1128 Lechmere, 747 all); FY1998 (1212 Lechmere, 658 all); FY1997 (928 Lechmere, 557 all); FY1996 (943 Lechmere, 591 all); FY1995 (1725 Lechmere, 586 all); FY1994 (755 Lechmere, 503 all). 59-69 NLRB ANN. REP. (1995–2005).
111 Snyder’s of Hanover, 334 N.L.R.B. at 185.
112 Snyder’s of Hanover, Inc. v. NLRB (Snyder’s of Hanover II), 39 F. App’x 730, 731–32 (3d Cir. 2002).
113 Id. at 732.
calling the police to remove them. At first, this appeared to be an easy case; the organizers were told by government officials that they could handbill in a public right-of-way. Thus, the employer seemed to lack a property interest sufficient to invoke Lechmere which, under the Board’s current analysis, meant that the attempt to stop the handbilling was unlawful. What developed during litigation, however, reveals how state property law issues can be far more complex than they first appear—and why those issues are best left to state courts rather than a federal agency specializing in labor law.

As the employer itself initially failed to realize, Pennsylvania’s treatment of the public’s right to use a right-of-way is counter-intuitive. In Pennsylvania, a landowner owns to the middle of an abutting street, “subject only to an easement of public use.” The scope of that easement is defined entirely by the relevant municipality’s authorization of a given use by the public. Any use not expressly permitted by the municipality may be stopped by the landowner. In Snyder’s, the Board had found that the employer’s attempt to stop the handbilling was unlawful because it had failed to provide any evidence of the scope of the municipality’s authorization of public use on the easement and thereby failed to satisfy its burden to show that it possessed a right to exclude. The Third Circuit—via a panel including then-Judge Alito—disagreed, holding that the employer did not bear the burden of proving what the municipal code permitted, and that the court’s interpretation of the code showed no express authorization for union handbilling on public rights-of-way.

The convoluted nature of this analysis illustrates the difficulties encountered by the Board and courts when they have to examine 114 Snyder’s of Hanover, 334 N.L.R.B. at 189; see infra note 166 (discussing whether calling police still violates the NLRA). The union also charged the employer with unlawfully engaging in surveillance of employees receiving the handbills; the Third Circuit enforced the Board’s finding that the surveillance violated section 8(a)(1). See Snyder’s of Hanover II, 39 F. App’x at 735–37; infra notes 218–230 and accompanying text (discussing surveillance).

---

115 Snyder’s of Hanover, 334 N.L.R.B. at 185.

116 See Bristol Farms, 311 N.L.R.B. at 438; supra notes 86–107 and accompanying text.

117 Snyder’s of Hanover, 334 N.L.R.B. at 187 n.8 (noting that employer raised this issue after the initial hearing).

118 Id. at 189 n.4 (quoting City of Philadelphia v. Street, 63 Pa. D. & C.2d 709 (1974)).

119 Id. at 187 n.8; accord 46 S. 52nd St. Corp. v. Manlin, 157 A.2d 381, 386 (Pa. 1960).

121 334 N.L.R.B. at 184.

122 Snyder’s of Hanover II, 39 F. App’x at 734.
state property law. Indeed, the issue in Snyder's was more complicated than either the Board or the Third Circuit acknowledged, as neither addressed whether the express permission to handbill given to the organizers by local and state officials constituted "authorization" under Pennsylvania law.

Moreover, as the Third Circuit noted, Pennsylvania's expansive view of landowners' control over public rights-of-way also raised constitutional concerns. Accurately noting that the Board did not address this constitutional issue, the Third Circuit used this omission to justify its own avoidance of the issue. These omissions alone aptly demonstrate why state property law should not be resolved in federal labor cases. A serious constitutional right was at stake—whether a municipality can allow a landowner to stop expressive activity in a public right-of-way—yet the Board was unable, and the court unwilling, to address the issue. The Third Circuit's decision, in particular, was troubling, for it willingly approved interference with organizers' expressive activity pursuant to a rule about which it had obvious constitutional misgivings. Eliminating state property law from the Board's analysis would produce a far better outcome. Under the proposal here, the Board would have examined only whether the employer's actions chilled employees' labor rights; any attempt to invoke or challenge Pennsylvania's public rights-of-way rule would be determined by a state court that presumably would not be hesitant to entertain the constitutional issue.

\[123\] See 334 N.L.R.B. at 184.
\[125\] What the court failed to recognize was that the Board could not address the issue, as it lacks the power to declare laws unconstitutional. See Tessler Lutheran Home for Children v. NLRB, 677 F.2d 302, 304 (3d Cir. 1982) (citing Califano v. Sanders, 430 U.S. 99, 109 (1977)) ("We agree with the Board that it has no authority to rule on constitutional questions . . . ."); see also Johnson v. Robison, 415 U.S. 361, 368 (1974).
\[126\] Snyder's of Hanover II, 39 F. App'x at 734. The court was not warranted in avoiding an issue that the Board could not address. See Overstreet v. United Bhd. of Carpenters, 409 F.3d 1199, 1209 (9th Cir. 2005) (holding that "because constitutional decisions are not the province of the NLRB . . . the tasks of evaluating the constitutional pitfalls of potential interpretations of the Act and of interpreting the Act to avoid those dangers are committed de novo to the courts").
\[127\] See Snyder's of Hanover II, 39 F. App'x at 734; Tessler Lutheran, 677 F.2d at 304.
\[128\] See Snyder's of Hanover II, 39 F. App'x at 733–34.
\[129\] See infra notes 156–290 and accompanying text.
A further issue in Snyder's illustrates another complication in the Board tackling state property law—possible disputes over property boundaries. Although the employer was named “Snyder’s of Hanover” and stated throughout the litigation that its plant was in Hanover Township, it argued for the first time in its reply brief to the court that its plant was actually in Penn Township. The almost comical nature of this issue should not obscure the serious concern that it raises. If the dispositive property boundaries in a case are so confusing that the landowner itself is perplexed, we cannot expect an agency that specializes in federal labor law to accurately and efficiently resolve the matter. Enforcement of the NLRA and Pennsylvania property law would have been far better served had a Pennsylvania court, not the Board, delved into these complicated state law issues.

The extraordinarily limited ability to use a public right-of-way in Pennsylvania sharply contrasts with the broad right to access certain private property in California. In particular, California’s prohibition against landowners barring uninvited expressive activity on private property that is generally open to the public provides further support for the elimination of state law questions from federal labor cases. This rule was implicated in the Board’s 2001 decision in Waredmart Foods, where, to an even greater degree than Snyder’s, the Board’s current analysis led to a significant federal intrusion into state property law.

At issue in Waredmart was whether California law provided an employer the right to exclude union handbilling in front of its supermarket. Organizers, standing in the employer’s parking lot, distributed handbills to customers urging them to boycott the store. The employer responded by asking the organizers to leave and calling the 130 Compare Reply Brief on Behalf of Petitioner at 6 n.2, Snyder’s of Hanover II, 39 F. App’x 730 (No. 01-2702), 2001 WL 34545824, at *n.2, with Brief on Behalf of Petitioner at 4, Snyder’s of Hanover II, 39 F. App’x 730 (No. 01-2702). The court took judicial notice of the fact that the facility was in Penn Township. Snyder’s of Hanover II, 39 F. App’x at 783.

---

131 Snyder’s of Hanover II, 39 F. App’x at 734 n.1 (stating that Board possessed “specialty in labor law only . . . [but] issues of labor law are intricately tied to issues of state law . . . [and] the Board routinely plies its hand at interpreting state law, an area of law in which it has no expertise,” yet holding that, unlike foreign law, Board should not require parties to prove state law as issue of fact).

132 See supra notes 110–131 and accompanying text; infra notes 153–152 and accompanying text.

133 See CAL. CIV. PROC. CODE § 527.3 (West 1979 & Supp. 2006); infra note 139.

135 Waremart, 337 N.L.R.B. at 289.

136 Waremart, Inc. v. NLRB (Waremart II), 354 F.3d. 870, 871 (D.C. Cir. 2004).
Acting on the union’s subsequent section 8(a)(1) charge, the Board found that the employer’s conduct was unlawful because it lacked a right to exclude under California property law. The basis for that finding was state court decisions holding that landowners could not unreasonably bar expressive activity in privately-owned shopping areas.

The D.C. Circuit’s initial review of the Board’s decision noted that these cases were based on either a California statute, the California Constitution, or the federal Constitution. The problem, according to the court, was that an intervening U.S. Supreme Court decision had undermined the federal constitutional rationale, and that subsequent California appellate courts had cast doubt on whether state law protected expressive activity on property near private, stand-alone stores. The D.C. Circuit, therefore, certified to the California Supreme Court two questions: (1) whether California law permitted the employer to prevent expressive activity in its parking lot and walkways; and (2) if the employer generally possessed that right, whether California law carved out an exemption allowing union expressive activity related to a labor dispute with the landowner.

---

137 Id.
141 Id. at 226 & n.2, 227 (citing Golden Gateway Ctr. v. Golden Gateway Tenants Ass’n, 29 P.3d 797, 809 & n.11 (Cal. 2001); Hudgens, 424 U.S. at 518-21; Albertson’s, Inc. v. Young, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 721, 731-34 (Cl. App. 2003) (distinguishing Robins because private supermarket is unlike traditional public forum); Young v. Raley’s, Inc., 107 Cal. Rptr. 2d 172, 179-82 (Cl. App. 2001) (same); Waremart, Inc. v. Progressive Campaigns, Inc., 102 Cal. Rptr. 2d 392 (Cl. App. 2000) (same); Trader Joe’s v. Progressive Campaigns, Inc., 86 Cal. Rptr. 2d 442, 448-49 (Cl. App. 1999) (same)). Young and Waremart v. Progressive Campaigns were “depublished” by the California Supreme Court’s initial grant, then dismissal, of review. See Waremart II, 354 F.3d at 874 n.3.
142 Waremart I, 333 F.3d at 227-28 (questioning whether the Sears plurality established general right to expressive activity or special rule for labor activity).
Given California's own confusion, the D.C. Circuit's desire for clarification was understandable, but ultimately fruitless. The California Supreme Court refused to accept the certification, thereby forcing the federal court to make its own determination of state property law. The D.C. Circuit concluded that the primary California Supreme Court decision cited by the Board relied on a state anti-labor injunction statute, rather than the state constitution's protection of expressive activity. Because two U.S. Supreme Court decisions had since ruled that special exemptions for labor picketing violated the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, the D.C. Circuit concluded that this state decision "cannot reflect current California law." Thus, according to the D.C. Circuit, California no longer gave special protection to expressive activity occurring on property owned by the targeted employer.

The D.C. Circuit then rejected the Board's argument that California generally limited a landowner's right to restrict expressive activity on its property. According to the court, the California Supreme Court decision supporting that argument was based on a federal constitutional interpretation that the U.S. Supreme Court later abandoned. Particularly interesting was the D.C. Circuit's reliance on two California appellate courts that came to the same conclusion, despite a Ninth Circuit decision to the contrary.

---

143 See Waremart II, 354 F.3d at 871. Unlike in Waremart II, the D.C. Circuit recently was successful in certifying a similar question to the California Supreme Court. See News Release, Judicial Council of Cal., Admin. Office of the Courts, Summary of the Cases Accepted During the Week of August 14, 2006 (Aug. 17, 2006) (announcing California Supreme Court's acceptance for review of Fashion Valley Mall, L.L.C. v. NLRB, Case No. S144755), available at http://www.courtinfo.ca.gov/courts/supreme/summaries/W081406.PDF; see also Fashion Valley Mall, L.L.C. v. NLRB, 451 F.3d 241, 246 (D.C. Cir. 2006) (holding that whether employer's anti-boycott rule violated the NLRA depends on whether the rule violated state law).

144 Id. at 874 (holding that Sears relied on the Moscone Act).

145 Id. at 875 (citing Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455, 466 (1980); Police Dep't of Chi. v. Mosley, 408 U.S. 92, 93 (1972)) ("We believe that if the meaning of the Moscone Act came before the California Supreme Court again, it would either hold the statute unconstitutional or construe it to avoid unconstitutionality.").

146 See Waremart II, 354 F.3d at 875.

147 Id.

148 Id. (citing Hudgens, 424 U.S. at 518–21; In re Lane, 457 P.2d at 565).

149 Waremart II, 354 F.3d at 875 (citing Albertson's, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d at 755; Trader Joe's, 86 Cal. Rptr. 2d at 450).

150 Waremart II, 354 F.3d at 875-76 (citing NLRB v. Calkins, 187 F.3d 1080, 1089-93 (9th Cir. 1999)). The D.C. Circuit also rejected the application of Robins because, unlike the shopping center there, the Waremart supermarket—a stand-alone store—could not constitute a traditional public forum. See Waremart II, 354 F.3d at 876.
Regardless of one's view of the substance of the D.C. Circuit's interpretation of California law, the analysis itself is disturbing. The Board's decision in Waremart involved an initial construction of state law by a federal agency with expertise solely in labor law.\textsuperscript{151} That interpretation was reversed by a federal court that overruled a state supreme court decision based in large part on the holdings of two state appellate courts—even though the federal appeals court that hears most California federal cases ruled the other way.\textsuperscript{152} It is hard to imagine a worse method to analyze state property law, yet this process is essentially required by the Board's current right-to-access scheme.\textsuperscript{153}

Most worrisome is the fact that federal agencies and courts, rather than state courts, are resolving ambiguities in state law.\textsuperscript{154} Thus, the Board's reliance on state law causes not only delay and unnecessary variance in the enforcement of federal labor rights, but also inexpert federal interference with state law.\textsuperscript{155}

This Article's proposal would improve this situation drastically by having the Board and federal courts look solely to federal labor issues, while leaving state property questions to state courts. There is little, if any, benefit from federal interpretation of state property law, particularly when originated by the Board. Moreover, federal labor policy suffers when its enforcement varies depending on geography. No labor policy is served by having an identical action considered lawful in some states, yet unlawful in others. The proposal would remove that inconsistency, thereby strengthening both the enforcement of federal labor policy and the autonomy of state property law.

\textsuperscript{151} See Waremart, 337 N.L.R.B. at 289.

\textsuperscript{152} Waremart II, 354 F.3d at 875-76; Calkins, 187 F.3d at 1089-93. Waremart II also raises the threat that federal courts will limit state attempts to protect labor speech. See Aron Fischer, Comment, \textit{Is the Right to Organize Unconstitutional?}, 113 Yale L.J. 1999, 2002 (2004) ("Taken at face value, the D.C. Circuit's reasoning would seem to invalidate all state laws expanding the rights of nonemployee organizers."); cf. Estlund, supra note 9, at 309 (citing Rum Creek Coal Sales, Inc. v. Caperton, 926 F.2d 353 (4th Cir. 1991)) (arguing that, under \textit{Lechmere}, NLRA cases may override state limits on landowners' right to exclude).

\textsuperscript{153} See supra note 12 (citing complicated state property law issues); see also Corp. Interiors, Inc., 340 N.L.R.B. 732, 745 (2009) (concluding that employer unlawfully removed union picketers from public easement near employer's office, because agreement with city to maintain area did not include right to exclude).

\textsuperscript{154} See Waremart II, 354 F.3d at 875-76; Waremart, 337 N.L.R.B. at 289.

\textsuperscript{155} See supra notes 143-154 and accompanying text.
II. THE NEW PARADIGM: HOW—NOT WHERE—THE EMPLOYER EXCLUDES

Under the NLRB's right-to-access dichotomy, employer interference with nonemployee activity on property that the employer controls is almost always lawful.156 If the activity is non-trespassory, virtually all employer interference is unlawful.157 The rationale of the U.S. Supreme Court in Lechmere, Inc. v. NLRB, however, belies that framework. Under Lechmere, employer interference with organizing activity never violates nonemployees' derivative rights, unless the interference is discriminatory or eliminates all reasonable means to communicate with employees.158 Accordingly, this Article's proposal deems nonemployees' derivative rights satisfied wherever reasonable alternatives exist.

Although a substantial modification of the Board's current analysis, the proposal is consistent with both Lechmere and the Board's reliance on the employee/nonemployee distinction. It also would respect Lechmere's intent to protect employers' property interests where organizers have other means of achieving their goal. Most important, it would eliminate the Board's ineffective forays into state property law. Instead, the Board would concentrate on the issue it should have been addressing all along—whether the manner in which an employer tried to stop nonemployee activity infringed employees' rights under the NLRA.

A. Presumptions of Interference

With few exceptions,159 the Board has not examined regularly whether the manner in which an employer attempts to exclude nonemployee activity tends to chill employee rights. This omission is curious, as it is easy to imagine that an employer's exclusion of organizers would often hinder employees' willingness to seek collective representation. Indeed, a major shortcoming of Lechmere is its failure to acknowledge that virtually all exclusions negatively impact employees' section 7 rights in some fashion.160 Recognizing Lechmere as control-

156 See supra notes 93-94 and accompanying text.
157 See supra notes 96-97 and accompanying text.
158 See Waldbaum, Inc. v. United Farm Workers, 383 N.Y.S.2d 957, 975 (Sup. Ct. 1976) (holding that union's picketing targeting one employer in shopping mall had no reasonable alternative location to the area in front of employer's store); supra notes 96-107 and accompanying text; infra notes 233-247 and accompanying text.
159 See infra note 204 and accompanying text.
160 See Eslund, supra note 9, at 330-33.
ling law, however, the proposal would accept its disregard of the deri-vate infringement of employee rights caused by an employer's elimination of an important source of information about collective representation. Yet, the proposal here attempts to address the possible direct impact on section 7 rights left untouched by Lechmere—where the employer's exclusion interferes with employees' willingness to pursue unionization.

Section 8(a)(1) prohibits any action by the employer that tends to coerce, restrain, or interfere with employees' section 7 right of self-organization. The central question for determining such a violation is whether the employer's conduct tends to be coercive; the existence of animus or intended coercion is irrelevant. Given the lack of a good-faith defense, as well as employees' economic dependence on their employer, it is safe to assume that certain attempts to bar organizing activity would tend to make an employee reasonably believe that a decision to unionize would be met with harsh consequences.

The question, then, is what type of exclusionary conduct would tend to interfere improperly with employees' rights? The Board addresses this kind of issue regularly and is well-equipped to do so in right-to-access cases. Although the Board could use a case-by-case analysis, it seems far better to provide the parties, especially employers, with clear guidelines. Employers then would no longer face the unenviable choice of either allowing what may be a trespass on its property or attempting to protect its perceived property interest by risking a violation of the NLRA. Thus, instead of a case-specific analysis, the proposal creates a set of presumptions to guide employer and union conduct.

---

161 See Retlaw Broad. Co. v. NLRB, 53 F.3d 1002, 1006 (9th Cir. 1995).
162 The Supreme Court has long held that a "violation of [section] 8(a)(1) alone ..."

presupposes an act which is unlawful even absent a discriminatory motive." Textile Workers Union of Am. v. Darlington Mfg. Co., 380 U.S. 263, 269 (1965); accord Retlaw Broad., 53 F.3d at 1006 (holding that an "anti-union motive is not required" under section 8(a)(1)).

163 See supra note 70.
164 See Zmija, supra note 63, at 117–18 (describing costs of ambiguity under NLRB v.

Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 (1956)). Indeed, things have not improved much since Professor Gould, writing before he became NLRB Chairman, emphasized that parties need deliverance from the "morass" of no-solicitation rulings and that, "[m]ore than anything else, the law must have clarity and a practical appreciation for the parties' needs."
Gould, supra note 36, at 146.
165 The Board frequently uses such presumptions, which courts have readily accepted.
Indeed, an excellent example is employee solicitations on employer property. See supra note 22 and accompanying text.
First, the Board should deem presumptively lawful any action by the employer that does not go beyond simply and peacefully requesting that nonemployees stop organizing on property that, from the employees' perspective, is clearly or questionably under the employer's control. Asking law enforcement to remove the organizers would typically constitute such a request. 166

The rationale for this presumption is that the Board should not police the parties' conduct as long as the dispute remains simply a question of control and use of the property. 167 Organizers, however, could justify Board action by rebutting the presumption—showing, for example, that employees would view a nominally peaceful request as coercive or threatening because of a recent pattern of unlawful employer resistance to unionism. 168 Similarly, an employer could an-

166 Although calling the police to remove organizers could easily chill employee rights, recent Supreme Court decisions have limited the Board's ability to regulate employers' First Amendment right to redress the government. See Bill Johnson's Rests., Inc. v. NLRB, 461 U.S. 781, 744-45 (1983) (holding that Board could enjoin state lawsuit only if it lacked a reasonable factual or legal basis); see also BE&K Constr. Co. v. NLRB, 536 U.S. 516, 536-37 (2002) (clarifying this standard). These cases also may restrict the Board's ability to find an unfair labor practice based on a call to the police. Indeed, despite suggestions by the Board that calling the police is not covered by Bill Johnson's, the Board's General Counsel has begun treating such calls as protected by the First Amendment. Compare Corp. Interiors, Inc., 340 N.L.R.B. 732, 745 (2003) (finding unfair labor practice for calling police to remove union from public easement), and In re Wild Oats Mkts., Inc., 336 N.L.R.B. 179, 182 (2001) (stating that, if employer "had called the police to request [the union's] removal, the Board would have found [it] in violation of Section 8(a)(1)"), with Advice Memorandum from NLRB to U.S. Postal Service, Case 30-CA-15880(P) (Mar. 24, 2003) (on file with author) (stating that calling police is covered by Bill Johnson's). Therefore, the proposal would treat a call to the police as presumptively lawful unless it is without basis. Cf. Radcliffe v. Rainbow Constr. Co., 254 F.3d 772, 785 (9th Cir. 2001) (permitting state tort claims for false imprisonment, false arrest, and malicious prosecution based on calls to police); Johnson & Hardin Co. v. NLRB, 49 F.3d 237, 242-43 (6th Cir. 1995) (filing of criminal trespass charges against union lawful because of genuine issue of material fact on merits of trespass suit). This issue, however, is unlikely to be resolved soon, as it raises significant questions about the Board's ability to enforce the Act and the treatment of First Amendment conduct in different contexts. Compare Bill Johnson's, 536 U.S. at 744-45 (permitting lawsuit against union unless it lacks reasonable factual or legal basis), with Roger D. Hughes, 344 N.L.R.B. No. 49, slip op. at 3 n.4 (Mar. 31, 2005) (finding call to police to be unlawful because employer did not have "good faith, albeit erroneous, belief" that union misconduct had occurred). Moreover, the Board's treatment of this issue further indicates why its current right-to-access analysis does not work. The Board has previously found calls to police to be lawful if the employer had control over the property and unlawful if it lacked control. See Corp. Interiors, 340 N.L.R.B. at 745. Yet, whether subsequent litigation determines that the employer had a state right to exclude says little about the reasonableness of the employer's call to the police.

167 See NLRB v. Calkins, 187 F.3d 1080, 1087-88 (9th Cir. 1999).

168 See infra note 210 and accompanying text.
swer that union violence or interference with business justified a stronger response.\textsuperscript{169}

The other side of this presumption is that any actions by the employer that go beyond a peaceful request would be viewed as coercive.
Conduct such as threats, harassment, and violence assumedly inform employees that the employer's concern extends beyond its property interests and that attempts to unionize will result in harmful consequences.\textsuperscript{170} The employer could rebut this presumption by showing that extra measures were needed to respond, for example, to organizers who refused to stop blocking traffic or harassing customers. Like its traditional section 8(a)(1) interference analysis, the Board would resolve such questions by looking for hostile conduct by either party, discriminatory exclusions by the employer, and other relevant factors.

This scheme would apply no matter what the employer's state property interests turn out to be. If organizers are on a public right-of-way that is arguably under the employer's control, the Board's analysis would be the same, regardless of how a state court would ultimately resolve the trespass issue. In short, the Board would remain focused solely on whether the employer behaved in a way that tended to infringe employees' labor rights, and leave the state trespassory issue to state courts. There is simply no reason for the Board to delve into complicated state law to determine whether the NLRA has been violated.

The location of the organizing, however, would not be totally irrelevant. The presumption analysis would apply where organizing occurs on property over which the employer clearly, or questionably, has a right to exclude. Alternatively, if the organizing takes place on property that employees would clearly view as outside the employer's control—for instance, a public park near the worksite—\textit{any} employer attempt to exclude would be presumptively unlawful. In such instances, the employer's conduct likely would send the message to employees that its aim is to interfere with union activity, not to protect its property interests. Importantly, the determination whether the property is clearly not under the employer's control will be based solely on reasonable employees' viewpoints, not state property law.

This scheme covers the entire spectrum of employer control over property. Employees' belief that an employer clearly lacks control \textsuperscript{169} See infra notes 194–197 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{170} Indeed, the Board has found that such conduct can violate section 8(a)(1) even if it was not witnessed by employees. See Hughes, 344 N.L.R.B. No. 49, at 3 (citing, in case involving threats and physical attack on picketers, \textit{Corp. Interiors}, 340 N.L.R.B. at 739–41; Bristol Farms, Inc., 311 N.L.R.B. 437, 439 (1993)).
over property would create a presumption against the lawfulness of employer interference; conversely, where the employer clearly controls the property, the presumption would favor the employer. In the remaining middle ground—where the employer's control is less certain—the employer again would enjoy a presumption of lawfulness for all peaceful attempts to stop organizing. This middle ground may, depending on the circumstances, provide a benefit over current law for one of the parties. For instance, there will be some peaceful employer interference on property in this middle ground that the proposal would deem presumptively lawful, but that the Board currently would regard as unlawful if it ultimately found no right to exclude under state law. Similarly, if the employer engaged in coercive interference on property that is later determined to be under its control, the proposal would treat the interference as presumptively unlawful, though the Board currently would find the same conduct to be lawful.

This difference is not as extreme as it may appear, for the Act has long proscribed even good-faith employer conduct that tends to infringe employees' labor rights. The proposal merely seeks to correct the Board's omission in not regularly looking at the issue of the employer's conduct. Indeed, the Board has sporadically found that an employer's exclusion of nonemployee organizers unlawfully chilled employee rights. The proposal would merely regularize that inquiry and, much like the U.S. Supreme Court in Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, create a presumption that employer conduct extending beyond a peaceful request for nonemployees to stop organizing, or for government assistance, tends to interfere with employee rights.

A major benefit of the proposal is that the Board would no longer have to examine state property law and instead would focus on what it does best—examining whether conduct tends to interfere with rights protected under the Act. A hypothetical case where an employer peacefully asks union organizers to vacate a public easement over which employees generally believe the employer has a right to exclude illustrates the proposal's superiority over the current analysis. Even if state law ultimately reveals that the employer did not have a right to exclude, the employer's request would not chill employee rights because employees would tend to view the employer's conduct as a reasonable attempt to protect its property interest. If the employer tried to stop the organizing through harassment and violence, however, employees would tend to feel that their rights were being threatened, even where the employer had a right to exclude. The proposal would take these realities into account, in contrast to the current analysis, which would mechanically find that the employer violated the Act in the former instance, but acted lawfully in the latter.

171 See supra note 162 and accompanying text.
172 See Cent. Hardware Co., 181 N.L.R.B. 491, 492 (1970) (holding it unlawful to expel, in employees' presence, organizers who acted solely as store customers because expulsion was motivated by "antiunion considerations"), enforcement denied in relevant part, 439 F.2d 1821 (8th Cir. 1971), vacated, 407 U.S. 539 (1972); Heck's, Inc., 156 N.L.R.B. 760, 761 (1966); Marshall Field & Co., 98 N.L.R.B. 88, 104 (finding violation based on employer "forcibly" removing organizers from public gathering in employees' presence), enforced in relevant part, 200 F.2d 375 (7th Cir. 1952).
173 Cf. Estlund, supra note 9, at 333 ("[A]n employer's power to single out union organizers for exclusion ... demonstrates the employer's near-dictatorial power over the workplace, power it can use to keep the agents of unions, and perhaps unionization itself, at bay.").

This improvement also exists where employees reasonably believe that organizers are on public property. Even if that belief is incorrect, an employer's exclusion of organizers from that area is likely to have a deleterious effect on employees' freedom to choose collective representation. This analysis, moreover, creates little hardship for an employer, which has a great deal of control over employees' perceptions of its property. Any employer that wants to protect its ability to exclude peacefully nonemployees from property it controls needs only ensure that its employees are aware of that control.

The benefit to the parties of ex ante clarity should not be underestimated. Forcing parties to act based on guesses as to the future consequences of their actions may chill the exercise of legitimate labor and property rights. Further, Board delay in resolving property disputes may prompt harmful self-help measures, particularly where time-sensitive organizing is involved.

174 See supra notes 110-113 and accompanying text (describing organizers who were told by government officials that they could solicit on public right-of-way abutting employer's plant, though state property law suggested that employer had right to exclude over right-of-way).

175 Posting no-solicitation signs, or similar information, presumably would be sufficient. Of course, an employer could take advantage of this rule by posting no-solicitation signs on property over which it lacks a right to exclude. A union could counter such an attempt by using the property and informing employees that the signs are wrong. Similarly, the Board could find that an employer violates the Act by knowingly misleading employees about its property rights. To avoid the Board having to delve into property issues on even a peripheral matter, if such a violation were permitted it would have to be limited to the rare situations where the employer was able to deceive employees about an unambiguous property issue.

176 One state justice has described the potentially violent risk of delay and self-help in right-to-access cases:
The proposal recognizes that employer conduct beyond a peaceful request is likely to undermine the NLRA. Allowing such activity weakens the Act's ability to lessen labor strife and its resulting impact on commerce.\(^{177}\) Moreover, non-peaceful employer exclusions directly threaten the Act's fundamental protection of employees' freedom to choose whether to seek collective representation. The Board's failure to address regularly these concerns ignores the full impact of nonpeaceful attempts to stop organizing activity—attempts that "cause ... employees to weigh the possibility of incurring reprisals or other hostile employer reaction before undertaking to exercise their rights secured by the Act."\(^{178}\) The proposal does not make the same omission.

1. What Is Presumptively Lawful Conduct?

It is difficult to characterize precisely when an employer's request for organizers to leave will be peaceful enough to trigger the Board's presumption of lawfulness. The Board would have significant leeway in establishing the boundaries for this presumption; therefore, the following suggestions are merely a possible starting point for its analysis.

The employer's request in Montgomery Ward & Co. v. NLRB is an archetype of presumptively lawful conduct.\(^{179}\) There, the employer attempted to remove union organizers who were meeting employees in the employer's public cafeteria.\(^{180}\) Store managers told the organizers that they were trespassing and violating the store's no-solicitation policy, and said that if the organizers did not leave, they would call the \(^{178}\) NLRB v. H.R. McBride, 274 F.2d 124, 127 (10th Cir. 1960) (holding that employer violated section 8(a)(1) by physically assaulting and verbally abusing pickets).

\(^{179}\) See Montgomery Ward & Co. v. NLRB (Montgomery Ward II), 692 F.2d 1115, 1118 (7th Cir. 1982).

\(^{180}\) Id. at 1117–18.
Taking State Property Rights out of Federal Labor Law

police. The lawfulness of this conduct is complicated under the current scheme, as it requires the Board to determine whether, under state law, the employer had a right to exclude the organizers from property open to the public. The proposal's analysis would be far simpler. No matter the ultimate determination of the employer's state property rights, the peaceful demand that the organizers leave would be presumptively lawful, particularly given the employer's stated belief that the organizers' violation of the no-solicitation policy constituted a trespass. Under such circumstances, reasonable employees would not tend to view the request as chilling their freedom to pursue collective activity because it appears to be the employer's property. The only remaining question for the Board would be a possible union rebuttal. For example, the union could challenge the no-solicitation policy's validity or, if valid, claim that the employer enforced the policy in a discriminatory manner.

A union also could rebut the presumption of lawfulness by pointing to circumstances showing that employees reasonably would tend to view the employer's ostensibly innocuous conduct as threatening. Common rebuttal factors of this type would include evidence of the employer's open union animus, contemporaneous unfair labor practices, the timing of the employer's actions, and treating the union activity more harshly than other, similar conduct. An employer, for instance, may build a fence around its property which has the effect of preventing access by nonemployee organizers. The fence, by itself, raises no labor law concerns and would be presumptively lawful. The circumstances leading to the erection of the fence, however, may belie that presumption. If the fence suddenly appeared after a union organizing campaign began, the Board would be justified in finding interference with employees' rights. Similarly, if employer comments sug-

---

181 Id. at 1118–19.
182 See id. at 1124–28 (holding that no-solicitation policy was too broad and noting that the trespass question depended on employer's view of organizers' activity in public cafeteria); supra note 30.
183 See Montgomery Ward II, 692 F.2d at 1122 (holding that employer discriminatorily enforced policy, which tended to "coerce[], restrain[], and interfere[] with the exercise of protected rights").
184 See infra notes 208–210, 231–247 and accompanying text.
185 See, e.g., Four B Corp. v. NLRB, 163 F.3d 1177, 1183–84 (10th Cir. 1998) (holding that employer's new no-solicitation policy—"hastily implemented in the face of the Union's organizing effort"—was unlawful discrimination); NLRB v. Vill. IX, Inc., 723 F.2d 1360, 1366 (7th Cir. 1983) (holding that no-distribution rule created in response to organizing campaign was unlawful); Mini-Togs, Inc., 304 N.L.R.B. 644, 651 (1991) (concluding that, in response to organizing campaign, employer unlawfully prohibited nonemployees gested that the fence was intended to keep out union organizers, it would impact employee rights in a manner that a fence intended to stop a rash of burglaries would not. Although there are numerous other scenarios that would rebut a presumption of lawfulness, the underlying question always focuses on whether the employer’s seemingly unthreatening conduct would tend to interfere with employee rights.

This analysis promotes behavior by both organizers and employers that serves the Act’s objectives to promote industrial peace and protect employees’ freedom to choose whether to organize. Where employer attempts to stop organizing are done in a limited and peaceful fashion on property over which it at least questionably has control, the effect on union organizing and other labor rights is small or non-existent. Employees would view such conduct, absent countervailing circumstances, as an attempt to protect property interests rather than an attack on unionization. Moreover, organizers who believe they are on property out of the employer’s control simply could refuse to leave with the knowledge that more strident employer attempts to stop the organizing presumptively would violate the Act.

Finally, as it can do currently, an employer could press the property law issue through a state trespass claim—in response, for example, to organizers’ rejection of a peaceful request to leave.

These paths best promote the interests of the NLRA and state property law. Where the crux of a dispute is control of property, the state should resolve the issue; if the dispute centers on the infringement of employee rights, the NLRB is the best forum. The Board’s current scheme, however, requires it to decide the state property law issue, even where the case ultimately fails to implicate federal labor policy. In particular, under Lechmere, federal labor rights are not at stake where an employer exercises its state property interests in a manner that does not tend to chill employees’ labor rights. The from handing out union literature from parking lot), enforcement granted in part and denied in part, 980 F.2d 1027 (5th Cir. 1993). The remedy for such a violation may be limited, however, as it is not certain that the Board would, or could, order the fence taken down.

The section 8(a)(1) violation still is not dependent on the employer’s intent; rather, expressions of the employer’s motive are relevant only to the extent that they affect how a reasonable employee would tend to view the situation. See supra notes 161–162 and accompanying text.

Employer attempts to remove organizers from property that is obviously out of its control will be unlawful. See supra notes 166–171 and accompanying text.

See infra note 302 and accompanying text.

See supra notes 92–98 and accompanying text.

Board should leave such disputes where they belong—in courts of the state from which the property rights originate.\footnote{This argument is consistent with the NLRA's role in right-to-access cases. As noted by the Ninth Circuit, the U.S. Supreme Court has explained that: employers may exclude union organizers in deference to state common law, but not because the NLRA itself restricts access. "The right of employers to exclude union organizers from their private property emanates from state common law, and while this right is not superceded by the NLRA, nothing in the NLRA expressly protects it." \cite{Calkins, 187 F.3d at 1087-88 (internal citation omitted) (quoting Thunder Basin Coal Co. v. Reich, 510 U.S. 200, 217 n.21 (1994))}. Like the Court, the proposal attempts to prevent NLRA interference with state property law.}

2. What Is Presumptively Unlawful Conduct?

The proposal defines presumptively unlawful activity as any conduct that goes beyond a peaceful request for organizers to leave.\footnote{Repeated requests for the union to leave, especially where law enforcement has confirmed the union's right to continue, can be viewed as unlawful harassment. \cite{Calkins, 187 F.3d at 1087-88 (internal citation omitted) (quoting Thunder Basin Coal Co. v. Reich, 510 U.S. 200, 217 n.21 (1994))}. Like the Court, the proposal attempts to prevent NLRA interference with state property law.}\footnote{For example, increased limits on union activity may be appropriate if it disturbs hospital patients. \cite{Beth Isr. Hosp. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 501-02 (1978); NLRB v. S. Md. Hosp. Ctr., 116 F.2d 932, 935 (4th Cir. 1990).} \cite{CSX Hotels, Inc. v. NLRB, 340 N.L.R.B. 819, 820 (2003) (concluding that employer's repeated requests that police remove union organizers showed that its concern was stopping union, not traffic problems), enforcement denied, 377 F.3d 394 (4th Cir. 2004).} Because that definition covers a broad range of circumstances, the following are merely examples of actions that the Board would deem presumptively unlawful under the proposal. The examples are not exclusive; rather, they are intended to illustrate the type of employer conduct that represents a threat to employees' labor rights.

An employer, of course, could rebut the presumption that its attempt to stop organizing activity was unlawful. Typical rebuttals include special characteristics of the property at issue,\footnote{See CSX Hotels, Inc. v. NLRB, 377 F.3d 394, 400-01 (4th Cir. 2004) (holding that call to police was lawful because of traffic hazard); \cite{Victory Mkt., 322 N.L.R.B. 17, 20-21 (1996) (justifying exclusion based, in part, on traffic blockage). But see supra note 193.} organizing that causes safety problems\footnote{\cite{Victory Mkt., 322 N.L.R.B. at 20-21 (justifying exclusion based, in part, on interference with customers' entry and exit); Estlund, supra note 9, at 334, 352 (citing conduct that interferes with customers, creates safety hazards, or undermines security).} or harms the employer's business,\footnote{\cite{Victory Mkt., 322 N.L.R.B. at 20-21 (justifying exclusion based, in part, on interference with customers' entry and exit); Estlund, supra note 9, at 334, 352 (citing conduct that interferes with customers, creates safety hazards, or undermines security).} and violence.\footnote{\cite{Victory Mkt., 322 N.L.R.B. at 20-21 (justifying exclusion based, in part, on interference with customers' entry and exit); Estlund, supra note 9, at 334, 352 (citing conduct that interferes with customers, creates safety hazards, or undermines security).} Moreover, if employees view the property in question as clearly under the employer's control, organizers' resistance to a peaceful and non-discriminatory attempt to remove them may warrant some additional measures by the employer.\footnote{For example, otherwise unlawful surveillance might be justified in such a situation. See infra notes 218–230 and accompanying text.}

A useful guide in assessing the type of conduct that would commonly trigger the presumption of unlawfulness is the Board's 2003 decision in \textit{Corporate Interiors, Inc.} This case involved a union campaign to organize workers by, among other things, picketing on a public easement in front of the employer's office.\footnote{340 N.L.R.B. at 745–49.} The Board determined that the employer, a construction contractor, lacked a right to exclude picketers from the easement.\footnote{Id. at 734–35, 745 (noting employer's arrangement with city to maintain easement area).} That finding governed most of the Board's analysis of whether the employer's numerous attempts to stop the union organizing were lawful.\footnote{Id. at 745.} The wide range of employer conduct in \textit{Corporate Interiors}—including threats, harassment, and surveillance—provides an excellent illustration of why, in right-to-access cases, the Board should regularly address possible interference with employees' rights, instead of looking to state property law.\footnote{See id. at 745–49.}

\textbf{a. Threats}

One of the most obvious forms of employer resistance to organizing activity is the use of threats. Indeed, even currently, the Board typically recognizes that threats, particularly involving violence, are serious enough to infringe employees' freedom to choose whether to unionize.\footnote{Actual violence is plainly illegal as well. See \textit{Vill. IX}, 723 F.2d at 1365 (assaulting union leafletter near employees); \textit{H.R. McBride}, 274 F.2d at 126–27 (physically assaulting and verbally abusing picketers); Batavia Nursing Inn, 275 N.L.R.B. 886, 889 (1985) (punching union representative in front of employees as election ballots were to be counted); Kelco Roofing, 268 N.L.R.B. 456, 459 (1983) (bumping repeatedly union agent soliciting employees for authorization cards); Martin Arsham Sewing Co., 244 N.L.R.B. 918, 922 (1978) (hitting union agent during strike with employees watching).}

\textit{Corporate Interiors} provides several examples of such threats.\footnote{340 N.L.R.B. at 746.} For instance, the Board, disagreeing with the administrative law judge, found that the employer violated section 8(a)(1) because its threat to "blow [the picketer's] head off" if he did not leave reasonably tended
Taking State Property Rights out of Federal Labor Law

2006

207 See Corp. Interiors, 340 N.L.R.B. at 746. The Board did not address the A.L.J.'s finding that this comment was not serious enough to constitute an unlawful threat. Id. at 732-33 n.6, 746.

206 Id. at 732 (quoting Unbelievable, Inc., 823 N.L.R.B. 815, 816 (1997)). The administrative law judge (the "A.L.J.") had found that the comment was lawful because it was directed to another company official, not a union picketer or employee. Id. The Board appropriately disagreed, concluding that a threat of violence against a union picketer, made in the presence of employees, tended to interfere with employees' rights, no matter the officials' intent. Id.; see supra note 162 and accompanying text (noting that intent is not a necessary element of a section 8(a) (1) violation). This issue implicates the Board's "small-plant doctrine," which recognizes that most employees of a plant with less than 100 employees will hear about, and have their rights chilled by, threats and other coercive conduct that they did not personally witness. See Schaeff, Inc. v. NLRB, 113 F.3d 264, 267 n.8 (D.C. Cir. 1997); Hughes, 344 N.L.R.B. No. 49, at 3 (finding violations based on employer's actions against union "without reference to whether these actions were witnessed by any of the employer's statutory employees").

205 Id. at 732 (quoting Unbelievable, Inc., 823 N.L.R.B. 815, 816 (1997)). The administrative law judge (the "A.L.J.") had found that the comment was lawful because it was directed to another company official, not a union picketer or employee. Id. The Board appropriately disagreed, concluding that a threat of violence against a union picketer, made in the presence of employees, tended to interfere with employees' rights, no matter the officials' intent. Id.; see supra note 162 and accompanying text (noting that intent is not a necessary element of a section 8(a) (1) violation). This issue implicates the Board's "small-plant doctrine," which recognizes that most employees of a plant with less than 100 employees will hear about, and have their rights chilled by, threats and other coercive conduct that they did not personally witness. See Schaeff, Inc. v. NLRB, 113 F.3d 264, 267 n.8 (D.C. Cir. 1997); Hughes, 344 N.L.R.B. No. 49, at 3 (finding violations based on employer's actions against union "without reference to whether these actions were witnessed by any of the employer's statutory employees").

203 See supra notes 177-178 and accompanying text; infra note 214.

210 The Court has long held that an employer violates section 8(a) (1) by stating or implying that opting for collective bargaining would cost the employees existing benefits. See NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618-19 (1969). In determining the threatening nature of such statements, the Board looks to the context in which the statement was made. See UAW v. NLRB, 834 F.2d 816, 822 (9th Cir. 1987). For example, other unfair labor practices may make a seemingly innocuous statement appear threatening to employees. See id. (holding that other section 8(a)(1) violations are relevant in determining whether employees would tend to view employer's statement as threat); accord Allegheny to "interfere with the free exercise of employee rights." 206 Such extreme threats, however, are not necessary to invoke the presumption of unlawfulness. Milder comments—like the Corporate Interiors official who, while talking to employees about the union, stated that "[o]ne of these days I'm going to snap and when I do, I don't know what is going to happen" 207—also may chill employee rights.

These comments are exactly the sort of behavior that the Act was intended to prevent, and they should be considered unlawful, absent a satisfactory rebuttal by the employer. 208 Yet, the Board's current right-to-access analysis frequently ignores such threats if it determines that the employer had a right to exclude the organizers. 209 The organizers' presence on the employer's private property, however, does not reduce the likelihood that employees would tend to believe that they would be a target of the official "snapping" should they seek to unionize.

Similarly, an employer trying to stop organizing activity could more directly threaten employees by stating or implying that contact with organizers would be met with negative employment consequences. Such threats, although not violent, are aimed at work conditions and are clearly the type of conduct that the NLRA seeks to eliminate. 210 Ac-Accordingly, any employer attempt to stop organizing activity—even on property under its control—that directly or implicitly threatens organizers or employees should be presumptively unlawful.

b. Harassment

Similar to threats, but often viewed as less serious, is the harassment of organizers attempting to contact employees. For example, on several occasions during the Corporate Interiors dispute, the employer turned on the sprinkler system or aimed a hose at the union organizers.211 The employer also spread horse manure where the organizers were picketing and allegedly drove a car at them.212

Although the Board found that these harassing acts violated section 8(a)(1), the basis for that finding aptly illustrates the need to change the current analysis.213 The Board found the use of sprinklers to be unlawful because it was an attempt to remove the organizers from an area over which the employer had no right to exclude—not because the harassment infringed employee rights.214 Because the organizers in Corporate Interiors had numerous alternative means to contact employees, the employer's harassment could not infringe the organizers' derivative right to communicate with employees.215 Thus, it should not matter whether the employer had a state law right to exclude the organizers—either way, they possessed no federal labor right to contact employees from that particular location. Yet, the Board's decision suggests that had the organizing been on property that the employer controlled, the Board would have regarded the harassment as lawful.216 This makes little sense if the Board is focused on the infringement of derivative rights, and is an excellent example of why the current scheme poorly serves the NLRA. Moreover, regard-

Ludlum Corp. v. NLRB, 104 F.3d 1354, 1365 (D.C. Cir. 1997) (finding unlawful coercion because of context in which statement was given).

211 340 N.L.R.B. at 746-47. Although the employer argued that it frequently watered the area pursuant to its agreement to maintain the easement, testimony showed that the employer turned off the sprinklers when it called the police to the scene. Id. at 747.

212 Id. at 747. Depending on the manner in which the employer was driving, this could be considered violence or a threat of violence, rather than harassment. In Corporate Interiors, it appears that the employer did not intend to hit the picketers; rather, it merely wanted to move them out of the way. Id.

213 See id.

214 Id.; see Marshall Field, 98 N.L.R.B. at 103-04 (finding section 8(a)(1) violation based on employer "forcibly" removing organizers because it evidenced improper attempt to exclude), enforced in relevant part, 200 F.2d 375 (7th Cir. 1952).

215 See supra notes 99-105 and accompanying text.

216 See Corp. Interiors, 340 N.L.R.B. at 745.
less of where the organizers were located, a typical employee would view these acts as a clear signal that pursuing union representation would not be a wise career choice.

Instead of state property law, the Board's concern should be whether the harassment affected the employees' freedom to exercise their labor rights. Under the proposal, this type of harassment would trigger a presumption that the employer unlawfully interfered with employees' rights. Any reasonable employee, for example, would consider spraying water or spreading manure near organizers as an unnecessary provocation if the employer was merely attempting to protect its property interests. The employer, therefore, should bear the burden of rebutting the presumption that employees would tend to view its conduct as targeting organizing activity and chilling their freedom to pursue unionization. Absent such evidence, the Board should find that harassment of union organizers violates section 8(a)(1).

c. Surveillance

Another major source of presumptively unlawful activity is an employer's surveillance, or impression of surveillance, of employees' interaction with organizers. In safeguarding employees' freedom to choose whether to unionize, the Board has long been sensitive to the dangers posed by employer conduct that may lead employees to fear that special efforts are being taken to monitor their involvement in protected activity. Accordingly, absent sufficient justification, an employer's observance of employees engaged in protected activity, or making an impression of such observance, will normally interfere with employees' labor rights.

---

217 The employer could argue, hypothetically, that employees reasonably believed that the property was clearly the employer's and that the union had resisted peaceful requests to leave recently sodded ground that had to be watered.

218 See Nat'l Steel & Shipbuilding Co. v. NLRB, 156 F.3d 1268, 1271 (D.C. Cir. 1998) (holding that photographing or videotaping protected activity has tendency to intimidate employees); Belcher Towing Co. v. NLRB, 726 F.2d 705, 708 (11th Cir. 1984) (holding that, although surveillance is not per se unlawful, it has "natural, if not presumptive, tendency to discourage [union] activity"); Corp. Interiors, 340 N.L.R.B. at 746 (concluding that, absent proper justification, photographing or videotaping employees has "tendency to intimidate employees and plant a fear of reprisal"); Cook Family Foods, Ltd., 311 N.L.R.B. 1299, 1301 (1993), enforcement denied on other grounds, 47 F.3d 809 (6th Cir. 1995).

219 See Snyder's of Hanover, Inc. v. NLRB, 39 F. App'x 730, 736-37 (3d Cir. 2002) (watching employees take handbills); NLRB v. CWI of Md., Inc., 127 F.3d 319, 325-26 & n.3 (4th Cir. 1997) (impression of surveillance); U.S. Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 682 F.2d 98, 101-02 (3d Cir. 1982); Ingram Book Co., 315 N.L.R.B. 515, 518 (1994).
As the Board noted in Corporate Interiors, however, the lawfulness of employer surveillance will often depend on whether the organizers are trespassing or the employer has an objective basis for believing that the organizers will trespass.\(^{220}\) This is due to a generally available defense that the employer can satisfy with evidence that it conducted the surveillance to establish a valid trespass claim.\(^{221}\) Mirroring the current right-to-access analysis, this trespassing defense is tied to the Board's determination of state property law.\(^{222}\) In Corporate Interiors, therefore, the Board's conclusion that the organizers were not trespassing meant that the employer's surveillance was unlawful.\(^{223}\) The corollary is that a Board determination that the organizers were trespassing signifies that the surveillance would be valid.\(^{224}\) This is illogical, for the question whether the organizers were trespassing under state law says nothing about the surveillance's effect on employees.\(^{225}\) The proposal, therefore, would make all surveillance presumptively unlawful, as employees will tend to view such conduct,\(^{226}\) no matter where it occurs, as an attempt to monitor and interfere with their participation in organizing activity.\(^{227}\)

An employer may attempt to rebut this presumption. Under current Board law, employers can justify surveillance where there is a reasonable threat of union violence or other misconduct that would affect \(^{220}\) Compare Corp. Interiors, 340 N.L.R.B. at 746 ("The Board has . . . recognized that the taking of pictures or videotaping to document trespassory activity for the purpose of making out a trespass claim is an acceptable justification."). with N.L.R.B. v. Colonial Haven Nursing Home, Inc., 542 F.2d 691, 701 (7th Cir. 1976) (holding that "anticipatory photographing of peaceful picketing in the event something might happen does not justify an employer's conduct").

---

\(^{222}\) Corp. Interiors, 340 N.L.R.B. at 746.

\(^{223}\) Id. (suggesting that reasonable basis for believing that trespass may occur could justify surveillance).

\(^{224}\) See id.

\(^{225}\) See Mike Yurosek & Son, 229 N.L.R.B. 152, 152 n.3 (1977) (stating that employer's right to exclude is not relevant to the surveillance issue), rejected as dictum by Hoschton Garment, 279 N.L.R.B. at 567.

\(^{226}\) Surveillance requires more than the mere incidental observations that occur when an employer asks organizers to leave or engages in its normal work routine. Videotaping, photographing, or posting someone to watch the organizing, however, would be considered surveillance. See supra notes 219–220.

\(^{227}\) See Nat'l Steel, 156 F.3d at 1271 (holding that section 8(a)(1) violation depends on tendency to coerce, regardless of actual impact); Colonial Haven, 542 F.2d at 701 (holding that actual coercion is unnecessary for section 8(a)(1) violation; rather, "it is the tendency to interfere or coerce which is determinative").
the employer’s business. Moreover, some employer surveillance may be easier to defend where the organizing is on property that, from the employees’ perspective, clearly belongs to the employer. For example, organizing activity inside a store—like other unusual activity—would be expected to trigger some observation by the employer and would be unlikely to coerce employees. In contrast, organizing in a more remote area, such as a distant parking lot, would be less likely to warrant similar monitoring and employees may view surveillance there as a signal of employer hostility against unionization. Similarly, if the employer asks organizers to leave property that is arguably under its control and they refuse, employees likely would view the employer’s documentation of the possible trespass as an attempt to protect its property rights, not to chill their own labor rights. Observations beyond that needed for a trespass claim, however—for instance, videotaping for an extended period of time, using more intrusive means than previously employed for non-union trespassers, or adopting other measures that employees would reasonably view as excessive—would be insufficient to rebut the presumption.

The Board’s approval of coercive surveillance, based on its post hoc determination that a questionable state trespass claim was valid, yields improper results and avoids the real issue at stake in these cases. The proposal would correct this problem by focusing solely on employees’ reasonable perceptions of the surveillance, rather than state property law. Also, the proposal would permit a defense for employer monitoring of organizing activity in certain circumstances. Under this defense, an employer may engage in limited surveillance to protect against conduct that employees reasonably, albeit mistakenly, perceive as a debatable trespass. The surveillance, however, must be targeted only to the possible trespass, and must not occur in a context in which 228 See Nat’l Steel, 156 F.3d at 1271 (holding that “reasonable, objective justification,” such as legitimate security interests, gathering evidence for legal proceeding, or reasonable anticipation of misconduct, will mitigate tendency to coerce). Explaining to employees why the surveillance is necessary will be an important part of this rebuttal. Cf. Teletech Holdings, Inc., 333 N.L.R.B. 402, 403 (2001) (concluding that employer must clarify for employees a facially overbroad no-distribution rule to rebut presumption of unlawfulness).

229 See infra notes 231-247 and accompanying text. Moreover, if the surveillance occurs in a context that suggests more sinister motives, such as contemporaneous unfair labor practices, the rebuttal will likely fail. See supra note 210.

230 For example, observations accompanied by an increase in security could undermine an employer’s rebuttal. Cf. 6 W. Ltd. Corp. v. NLRB, 237 F.3d 767, 779 (7th Cir. 2001) (holding that increased security was lawful because of reliable information about past union disturbances).
employees would tend to believe that the observations were interfering with their labor rights.

d. Discrimination

An employer that exercises its right to exclude in a discriminatory fashion—such as having a no-solicitation rule that applies only to union conduct—has presented special difficulties for the Board. The Supreme Court's 1956 decision in NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co. long-ago noted discrimination, along with the lack of reasonable alternatives to reach employees, as an exception to its broad grant of employer authority to exclude nonemployee organizers. Discrimination, however, is a markedly different concern than the lack of reasonable alternatives.

Although discrimination is an obvious target for Board regulation, the current practice of making it a categorical exception to the Babcock/Lechmere framework ill-serves the Board's ability to prevent truly harmful discrimination. Rather than considering why discriminatory exclusions should be unlawful, the Board and courts have struggled to come up with a definition of discrimination that automatically triggers the exception. A far better approach would involve a more disciplined analysis that focuses on the labor law consequences of actions purported to be discriminatory. Therefore, instead of myopically determining whether a disparate exclusion policy qualifies as a categorical "exception," the proposal treats discrimination as a potential signal to employees that collective activity is not favored by their employer.

The problems in addressing discriminatory exclusions result from Babcock, which carved out an exception to an employer's right to remove organizers where it "discriminate[s] against the union by allowing other distribution." The Court never explained the basis for this exception and the two main possibilities under the Board's current analysis are unsatisfying.

One rationale states that an employer's refusal to allow labor organizing, while permitting other solicitations, so weakens its property interests that they no longer trump the organizer's derivative right to communicate with employees. Doctrinally, this is nonsense. Whether organizers' derivative rights are satisfied has nothing to do with the employer's property interests. Moreover, discriminatory access is perfectly consistent with the enforcement of an employer's property interests; deciding to whom to grant access is an important right associated with property ownership. Thus, unequal access does not diminish an employer's property interests.

---

252 See infra notes 253–259 and accompanying text.

The other reasoning is based on an employer's union animus. This explanation, however, is no more defensible than the property rights rationale. Under Babcock, an employer's discriminatory exclusion is a violation of section 8(a)(1), which does not rely on intent. Quite simply, whether an employer's discriminatory exclusion is motivated by good faith or by virulent hatred against unionization should not matter under section 8(a)(1). The proposal recognizes this important point.

Under the proposal, an employer’s discriminatory exclusion of organizers—even from property that is clearly the employer's or where the organizers have reasonable alternatives for reaching employees—would be presumptively unlawful. That presumption does not rely on the employer's property interests or motives. Rather, illegality is presumed because barring organizing from the property, while allowing other types of solicitation, tends to interfere with employees' rights. To be sure, such discrimination is often accompanied by an employer’s union animus, but even where it is not, the discrimination will tend to inform employees that negative consequences will follow if they pursue collective representation. This analysis is

---

235 Cf. Be-Lo Stores v. NLRB, 126 F.3d 268, 284 (4th Cir. 1997). The court in Be-Lo Stores noted:

Because nonemployees' claims to access to an employer's private property are at their nadir when the nonemployees wish to engage in protest or economic activities, as opposed to organizational activities, we seriously doubt, as do our colleagues in other circuits, that the Babcock & Wilcox disparate treatment exception, post-Lechmere, applies to nonemployees who do not propose to engage in organizational activities. Id. (internal citation omitted) (citing Cleveland Real Estate Partners v. NLRB, 95 F.3d 457, 465 (6th Cir. 1996)).

236 See Estlund, supra note 9, at 322; Stein, supra note 233, at 2051 (noting that Lechmere appeared to forbid balancing of property interests against derivative rights).

238 See Textile Workers Union, 380 U.S. at 269; Stein, supra note 233, at 2053-54; see also Zmija, supra note 63, at 126 (stating that discrimination also may violate section 8(a)(3), which requires finding that employer had anti-union motive).
consistent with section 8(a)(1)'s concern for the effect on employees no matter the employer's intent, and does not make the mistake of tying a violation to the employer's property interests.\textsuperscript{239}

The proposal would allow for a variety of definitions of discrimination while also providing assistance in choosing the most appropriate definition. The Board and courts have struggled to define discrimination, providing wildly differing interpretations, including: giving access to all groups but unions;\textsuperscript{240} allowing only work-related or isolated charitable solicitations;\textsuperscript{241} allowing all charitable solicitations;\textsuperscript{242} and favoring one union over another or allowing distributions by employers, but not unions.\textsuperscript{243} An employer's facially neutral no-solicitation rule also may be deemed unlawful if it was adopted for a discriminatory purpose.\textsuperscript{244}

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{239} See 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (2000).
  \item \textsuperscript{240} See Sandusky Mall Co., 329 N.L.R.B. 618, 620 (1999) (concluding that "an employer that denies a union access while regularly allowing nonunion organizations to solicit and distribute on its property unlawfully discriminates against union solicitation"), \textit{enforcement denied in relevant part}, 242 F.3d 682 (6th Cir. 2001); \textit{Victory Mktgs.}, 322 N.L.R.B. at 23–24 (finding discrimination where employer excluded union, but allowed gift-wrapping fundraisers, Salvation Army solicitations, auto sales, circus fliers, Chamber of Commerce information, and heart and cancer fund solicitations).
  \item \textsuperscript{241} See \textit{Four B Corp.}, 163 F.3d at 118; \textit{Lucille Salter Packard Children's Hosp. v. NLRB}, 97 F.3d 583, 588–90 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (holding that excluding unions while allowing employee fringe-benefit program solicitations was not discriminatory, but permitting solicitations about home and automobile insurance, child and family services, and credit union membership was discriminatory); \textit{Be-Lo Stores}, 318 N.L.R.B. 1, 10–12 (1995), \textit{enforcement denied in relevant part}, 126 F.3d 268 (4th Cir. 1997).
  \item \textsuperscript{242} See 6 West Ltd., 237 F.3d at 780 (holding that employer did not discriminate by allowing "innocent" employee solicitations for Girl Scout cookies, Christmas ornaments, and other purposes that "can be seen as beneficial to all employees," but not allowing union solicitation by employees); \textit{Lucille Salter}, 97 F.3d at 587 n.4 (noting that frequent charitable solicitations may provide basis for discrimination finding); \textit{NLRB v. Pay Less Drug Stores Nw., Inc.}, 57 F.3d 1077, 1077 (9th Cir. 1995) (Table).
  \item \textsuperscript{243} See \textit{Cleveland Real Estate Partners}, 95 F.3d at 464–65; Stein, supra note 233, at 2046. The Board has applied its non-acquiescent policy to the Sixth Circuit's narrow interpretation of discrimination by refusing to follow \textit{Cleveland Real Estate Partners}. See Sandusky Mall, 329 N.L.R.B. at 620–21 & n.10; cf. \textit{Guardian Indus. Corp. v. NLRB}, 49 F.3d 317, 320 (7th Cir. 1995) (suggesting "discrimination" depends on whether other activities with similar "character" as unions are permitted).
  \item \textsuperscript{244} See Youville Health Care Ctr., 326 N.L.R.B. 495, 495 (1998) (finding presumptively valid no-solicitation rule to have violated section 8(a)(1) because it was created in response to employees' protected activity); Gould, supra note 36, at 118–19 (proposing rule that looks to whether employer had previously announced solicitation limits). Such cases may blur the line between violations of section 8(a)(1), which do not focus on intent, and section 8(a)(3), which requires a finding of intent. See 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (3) (2000); supra note 162 and accompanying text. If, from the employees' point of view, the employer creates a rule in apparent response to protected activity, the rule will violate section 8(a)(1) no matter the employer's actual motive. Cf. \textit{Youville}, 326 N.L.R.B. at 495 (stating
These conflicting views derive largely from the Board and courts’ differing appreciation of employers’ property interests. Yet, as noted, discriminatory access is entirely consistent with the lawful exercise of property rights.\textsuperscript{245} The proposal, therefore, focuses only on whether the discrimination tended to infringe employees’ labor rights. That focus also should shape the boundaries of unlawfully discriminatory exclusions—in particular, exclusions that tend to chill employees’ rights. An appropriate rule would regard an employer’s refusal to allow union access, while permitting access to any other group—even charities—as presumptively unlawful discrimination.\textsuperscript{246} Absent an employer’s rebuttal, this disparate treatment would tend to interfere with employees’ rights by sending them the message that the employer is not concerned about solicitations generally, but instead is targeting union messages.\textsuperscript{247}

Although the Board’s current discriminatory exclusion scheme, almost uniquely among right-to-access issues, does not require an examination of state law, it has been illogical and confusing.\textsuperscript{248} The proposal would not fully resolve the differing interpretations of discrimination. It would assist that determination, however, by providing a far more consistent framework that turns the Board’s attention to where it should have been all along—determining whether the employer’s disparate exclusion tends to infringe employee rights.

\textbf{B. Preemption}

By keeping labor matters before the Board and property questions in state court, the proposal would implicate the issue of labor \textsuperscript{245} See supra note 237 and accompanying text.

\textsuperscript{246} See supra notes 239–240 and accompanying text. Despite this recommendation, the proposal could incorporate any interpretation of “discrimination.” See supra notes 240–243 and accompanying text.
\textsuperscript{247} For example, the policy at issue in \textit{American Postal Workers Union v. NLRB} not only prohibited all commercial and charitable solicitations, but also expressly proscribed solicitations either for or against unionization. 370 F.3d 25, 28–29 (D.C. Cir. 2004). Maintaining a general no-solicitation policy that also includes union solicitations helps protect against employees believing that union discussions are singled out. If, however, the employer’s policy targeted only union solicitations—even if it required neutrality—it would have been far more likely to violate the Act. Prohibiting only union material, even in an ostensibly neutral manner, sends a signal to employees that union activity is disfavored. See id. at 28.
\textsuperscript{248} See supra notes 231–247 and accompanying text.
preemption.\textsuperscript{249} The Board's current analysis, which fails to maintain the dichotomy between the federal and state interests, has made the preemption question especially confusing. Although the proposal does not dramatically alter the preemption analysis, it does simplify it under many circumstances.

Labor preemption of state trespass claims is governed by the U.S. Supreme Court's 1978 decision in \textit{Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. San Diego District Council of Carpenters}.\textsuperscript{250} Under traditional \textit{Garmon} preemption,\textsuperscript{251} the NLRA will generally preempt state lawsuits in two situations. First, preemption will occur when the suit involves conduct that is clearly protected or prohibited by the NLRA.\textsuperscript{252} Second, preemption will occur when the lawsuit involves conduct that is arguably protected or prohibited where there is a danger to national labor policy in allowing a state, rather than the Board, to examine the issue.\textsuperscript{253} The Court in \textit{Sears}, however, modified this analysis by holding that there is a substantive difference between preemption of state trespass claims directed at conduct that is \textit{prohibited}, as opposed to \textit{protected}, by the NLRA.\textsuperscript{254}

\textit{Sears} made clear that no significant conflict existed between a federal claim that union activity was prohibited by the NLRA and a state claim that the union was trespassing under state law; preemption of the trespass claim is not warranted in such a case because that claim is completely independent of the NLRA issue.\textsuperscript{255} What is less clear is whether the state and federal claims are distinct where the potential NLRA violation is an employer's response to an alleged trespass. The better outcome would hold that unfair labor practice charges against the employer will not preempt a state trespass claim.

\textsuperscript{250} \textit{Id}.

\textsuperscript{253} \textit{Sears}, 436 U.S. at 187–88 & n.11 (citing \textit{Garmon}, 359 U.S. at 244–45). The second major type of preemption is called \textit{Machinists} preemption, a "dormant preemption" that precludes state regulation where the Act intends parties to engage freely in economic conflict. See \textit{Rum Creek Coal Sales, Inc. v. Caperton}, 926 F.2d 353, 366 (4th Cir. 1991) (citing \textit{Lodge 76, Int'l Ass'n of Machinists v. Wis. Employment Relations Comm'n}, 427 U.S. 124, 144 (1976)) (holding that broad state exemption for labor-related trespass was preempted under \textit{Machinists}).

\textsuperscript{254} 436 U.S. at 188–90.

\textsuperscript{255} \textit{Id} at 185–86 (citing NLRA claims under section 8(b)(4)(D) and 8(b)(7)).
Especially given *Lechmere'*s concern for state property interests, it makes little sense for a federal labor claim that relies entirely on state property law to preempt a state trespass claim. Federal labor preemption seeks to prevent state litigation from interfering with a unified federal labor policy; where that policy hinges solely on state property law, such interference is non-existent.

The only occasion when state resolution of a trespass claim would conflict with federal labor law is where the union argues that the NLRA protects otherwise trespassory conduct. Absent such a claim, an unfair labor practice charge that challenges an employer's exclusion of organizing activity should not preempt the employer's state trespass claim against the union. This allows the claims to be heard in their appropriate forums—the Board determines the federal labor issue and state courts address the state property question.

In spite of this logic, courts have suggested that an NLRA charge against an employer will preempt a claim involving a traditional state area of regulation such as trespass. The influence of those cases is unclear, particularly after the Supreme Court's recent holding that a federal statute's express preemption rule—which blocks differing state requirements—will not preempt state suits that impose obliga-

---

256 See Lechmere, 502 U.S. at 533-35, 537.
258 This would occur where the union argues that no reasonable alternative means to contact employees exist. Cf. Radcliffe, 254 F.3d at 786 (holding that "because the Board ordinarily leaves to the State the question whether nonemployee union activity may be conducted on the employer's property," and there is little risk of interference with NLRA's enforcement, state claims for false arrest, false imprisonment, and malicious prosecution will not be preempted); Calkins, 187 F.3d at 1094-95 (rejecting employer's claim that NLRA, post-Lechmere, preempts state laws that prevent employers from excluding union activity, because such laws are not inconsistent with NLRA).
259 See Imondi v. Bar Harbor Airways, No. 81-0136, 1988 WL 2036, at *5-6 (D. Me. June 1, 1983) (stating, in Railway Labor Act case, that NLRA would preempt state malicious prosecution for trespass claim, even where reasonable-alternatives exception does not provide union right of access). Imondi was based in part on the questionable conclusion that malicious prosecution is not a state concern that is "deeply rooted in local feeling and responsibility." Compare Imondi, 1988 WL 2036, at *6, and Geske & Sons, Inc., 317 N.L.R.B. 28, 53 (1995) (concluding that state claims for trade libel and tortious interference with contractual relations and prospective advantage were preempted by NLRA because Board, which filed complaint, may find that state action would hinder federally-protected union activity), with Radcliffe, 254 F.3d at 785 (holding that false arrest, false imprisonment, and malicious prosecution are "deeply rooted" state interests), and Pa. Nurses Ass'n v. Pa. State Educ. Ass'n, 90 F.3d 797, 803 (3d Cir. 1996) (holding that trespass is a "deeply rooted" state interest and not preempted).
tions at least equivalent to the federal requirements. That holding suggests a view that is unlikely to justify preemption of a state trespass claim where the federal labor question turns on state property law.

To the extent that confusion exists, the proposal would simplify the issue. Because the Board would not look to state property law, there would be no potential for conflict between state and federal law. It also would eliminate the argument that warrants preempting state trespass claims because union access to an employer's property is a central interest of the NLRA and the Court "has gone to some lengths to state exactly what [it] entails." Under the proposal, the NLRA would be unconcerned with the possibility that the union was trespassing. Rather, the proposal recognizes the consistency in a state court determining that union activity constituted a trespass under state law, and the Board finding that the employer's attempt to remove the union violated the NLRA. Accordingly, absent a union claim that it is entitled to access under the reasonable-alternatives exception, an unfair labor practice charge based on an employer's exclusion should not preempt a state trespass claim.

The analysis changes, however, where the labor claim is based not on prohibited conduct, but on federally protected activity—such as union organizers defending a trespass claim by arguing that they had a right to access under the reasonable-alternatives exception. The NLRA will generally preempt state trespass claims where clearly protected labor activity is at issue; yet the validity of a reasonable-alternatives claim is rarely, if ever, clear ex ante. Thus, prior to Sears, preemption of a state trespass suit that involved a reasonable-alternatives defense was a murky question.

Because this defense initially requires an examination of federal labor law to determine whether reasonable alternatives existed, Sears

---

261 Bates is only the most recent in a somewhat tortured series of federal preemption cases involving state law, particularly in the area of torts. Thus, the long-term impact of Bates is unclear. See generally Jennifer S. Hendricks, Preemption of Common Law Claims and the Prospects for FIFRA: Justice Stevens Puts the Genie Back in the Bottle, 15 Duke Env'tl. L. & Pol'y F. 65 (2004) (discussing pre-Bates FIFRA preemption).

262 The exception is a reasonable-alternatives claim. See infra note 265 and accompanying text.

264 See Sears, 456 U.S. at 198.

265 If no other reasonable alternative means to communicate with workers exist, the NLRA gives organizers a derivative right to access an employer's property, which also serves as a trespassing defense. See supra note 63 and accompanying text.

266 See supra note 258 and accompanying text.
recognized that preemption may be required to avoid state interference with a matter that is generally within the Board's exclusive jurisdiction.\textsuperscript{267} Under \textit{Sears}, therefore, a Board complaint alleging that an employer unlawfully excluded organizers that lacked reasonable alternative means to contact employees will preempt the employer's state trespass action.\textsuperscript{268}

Board procedures, however, further complicate the analysis. The union in \textit{Sears} never invoked the Board's jurisdiction by filing an unfair labor practice charge; instead, it raised its reasonable-alternatives claim only as a defense to the state trespass suit.\textsuperscript{269} Yet as \textit{Sears} emphasized, an employer is unable to invoke the Board's jurisdiction to determine whether the NLRA provided the union with a right to access.\textsuperscript{270} According to the Court, it is inappropriate to preempt an employer's state trespass action based on a defense that the union refused to raise before the Board, as it would deprive the employer of an opportunity to have the issue heard at all.\textsuperscript{271} Preemption will be warranted only where the union filed a charge with the Board and alleged that the lack of reasonable alternatives gave it a right to access the employer's property.\textsuperscript{272} If the Board ultimately agrees with the un-

\textsuperscript{267} \textit{Sears}, 436 U.S. at 200–01.

\textsuperscript{268} Id. at 207. \textit{Sears} did not answer whether preemption is triggered by a union charge raising the reasonable-alternatives defense, or whether the Board must first issue a complaint—which requires a finding that prima facie evidence of a violation exists. \textit{Compare} id. at 209 (Blackmun, J., concurring) (arguing that "the logical corollary of the Court's reasoning is that" once union files charge, state trespass claim is preempted until Board refuses to issue complaint or rules against union), \textit{with} id. at 214 (Powell, J., concurring) (arguing that filing charge is not enough to preempt state cases, but leaving open whether Board's issuance of complaint would suffice). The Board has avoided conflict by stating that, in cases implicating arguably protected activity, "preemption does not occur in the absence of Board involvement in the matter, and... upon the Board's involvement, a lawsuit directed at arguably protected activity is preempted." Makro, Inc. (Loehmann's), 305 N.L.R.B. 663, 669–70 (1991) (defining "involvement" as issuing complaint); \textit{accord} Davis Supermarkets, Inc. v. NLRB, 2 F.3d 1162, 1179 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (approving \textit{Loehmann's} because it was more conservative than \textit{Sears} majority, which "strongly suggested that the union's filing of an unfair labor practice charge is sufficient in and of itself to trigger preemption"); Hillhaven Oakland Nursing Ctr. v. Health Care Workers Union, 49 Cal. Rptr. 2d 11, 18 & n.9 (Ct. App. 1996). Many courts have suggested that filing a charge with the Board is sufficient to initiate preemption. \textit{See} Davis Supermarkets, 2 F.3d at 1179; Reisbeck Food Mkts. v. UFCW, 404 S.E.2d 404, 410–11 (W. Va. 1991) (citing cases). Even if the Board issues a complaint, however, a union's obstructive or violent conduct—issues that touch deeply rooted local responsibility—will not be preempted. \textit{See} \textit{Reisbeck}, 404 S.E.2d at 411–12.

\textsuperscript{269} 436 U.S. at 200–02.

\textsuperscript{270} Id.

\textsuperscript{271} Id. at 202.

\textsuperscript{272} \textit{See} id. at 200–02.
ion, the employer’s exclusion was unlawful and preemption will continue.\(^{273}\) If the Board rejects the union’s argument, the union loses its federal right-of-access defense and the employer can then pursue a state trespass claim.\(^{274}\)

The proposal maintains Sears’s preemption analysis where union organizers raise a reasonable-alternatives claim. However, the proposal would clarify the preemption question where organizers challenge the manner in which an employer tried to stop organizing activity. Unlike the confusion wrought by the Board’s current analysis of an exclusion through the prism of state property law, the proposal’s elimination of the state law issue would obviate any question of preemption. This would allow the state to resolve whether the organizers were trespassing and the Board to address the manner in which an employer excluded the organizers. The dichotomous jurisdiction encourages behavior that advances both state and federal interests. Allowing states to address trespass claims quickly, and without the Board interference that currently may occur, discourages trespassing by organizers. Similarly, permitting the Board to remedy unlawful employer conduct without getting bogged down in state law promotes the exercise of property interests in a manner that respects employees’ labor rights. The result should be fewer trespasses and fewer coercive attempts to stop organizing activity.\(^{275}\)

C. A New Conception of Unions’ Derivative Rights

One incident in Corporate Interiors nicely distills the proposal’s advantages over the current scheme. At issue was the union’s attempt to communicate with employees working on a roof.\(^{276}\) The union obtained permission from the general contractor to be on the roof, but \(^{273}\) See id. at 202.

\(^{274}\) See Sears, 436 U.S. at 202.

\(^{275}\) State claims under the proposal also would coincide with state anti-labor injunction laws that mirror the federal Norris-LaGuardia Act. See 29 U.S.C. §§ 101-115 (2000); N.Y. Lab. Law § 807 (2002). Although many state laws, like the Norris-LaGuardia Act, prohibit injunctions against union organizing, an employer generally can seek to enjoin a union from trespassing while engaging in such activity. See Sears, 436 U.S. at 185 (emphasizing that employer’s attempt to obtain state injunction against trespass may proceed if it targeted only the location of union’s picketing and “asserted no claim that the picketing itself violated any state or federal law”); Waldbaum, Inc. v. United Farm Workers, 383 N.Y.S.2d 957, 968 (Sup. Ct. 1976) (holding that, under state anti-labor injunction statute, “[w]here illegal acts have been committed in the course of [otherwise lawful and protected] picketing ... injunctive relief may be warranted” if statute’s procedural requirements are satisfied).

\(^{276}\) 340 N.L.R.B. at 749.
the employer later told union organizers that they would have to leave because the access ladder needed to be removed.\textsuperscript{277}

Currently, the dispositive issue is whether the employer had a property interest that allowed it to exclude others from the roof.\textsuperscript{278} That makes little sense. If employees were aware that the employer had a legitimate reason to remove the ladder—a safety concern, for instance—there should be no violation of the Act. Absent circumstances that would lead employees to view the removal as threatening, or show that the union had no other reasonable means to communicate with employees, there were simply no labor interests at stake. Conversely, if the Board found that the employer lacked a right to exclude under its current analysis, the employer automatically would have committed an unfair labor practice.\textsuperscript{279} This forces the employer to choose whether to enforce its arguable property rights or do nothing in order to avoid risking an NLRA violation—a decision made more difficult by the fact that the property determination generally will take several years of litigation to resolve.\textsuperscript{280}

The proposal would eliminate this dilemma. By looking to the circumstances of the removal, rather than the employer's state property rights, the test focuses on the pertinent issue in right-to-access cases—the effect of the employers' removal of organizers on employees' labor rights. If employees would tend to perceive legitimate reasons for the removal, no NLRA violation exists. If, however, the employees had reason to believe that the removal was an attempt to target unionization,\textsuperscript{281} a section 8(a)(1) violation would be warranted.

Because employers no longer would face the uncertain choice of either allowing what may be a trespass or risking an unfair labor prac-

\textsuperscript{277} Id.
\textsuperscript{278} Id.
\textsuperscript{279} In Corporate Interiors, the Board found that the employer lacked a right to exclude the union because the general contractor gave the union permission to be on the roof; thus, the employer violated section 8(a)(1). Id.
\textsuperscript{280} The current analysis's focus on state property rights also forces unions farther away from the targeted business—for instance, encouraging picketing at a mall entrance, rather than near the targeted store. This may enmesh neutral employers into the labor dispute if customers think that the dispute involves the entire mall. See Jean Country, 291 N.L.R.B. 11, 18 (1988).
\textsuperscript{281} For example, Corporate Interiors involved numerous contemporaneous unfair labor practices, the employees apparently knew that the union had permission to be on the roof, and, after the union organizers left, the employer stated: "The only reason the ladders were taken was to get those fucking union guys off the roof." 340 N.L.R.B. at 749. Each of those factors, alone, would be sufficient to support a finding that the employer's conduct would tend to infringe employee rights.
ticc, the proposal would allow them to pursue property rights claims as long as employees' labor rights are not chilled. A union, in turn, has a strong incentive to ensure ex ante that it engages in organizing activity without trespassing. That certainty allows the union simply to refuse an employer's request to stop because it is assured that further attempts by the employer to interfere with the organizing will violate the Act. Moreover, when the union organizes on property over which control is unclear, it is likely to keep its activity peaceful and unobtrusive, because such conduct could be met at most by an equally unthreatening response by the employer. This should reduce labor tensions—a major goal of the Act.

Although an employer still would be able to pursue its trespass claim, the inquiry would take place where it belongs—in state court, not before the Board. It makes no sense to require a federal agency specializing in labor law to resolve state property issues. Moreover, under Lechmere, where organizers have reasonable alternatives to reach employees and the employer's attempt to remove the organizers is peaceful, the dispute does not implicate federal labor concerns. The issue, instead, is purely a question of state property law. Consequently, allowing state courts to resolve the dispute without Board involvement would protect states' interest in enforcing their own property laws and remove a frustrating and delay-ridden area from the Board's docket.

The proposal also has advantages over other suggested alternatives to the current system. Professor Cynthia Estlund, for example, has argued that the Lechmere analysis should be replaced with a "good reasons" test. Her test would use essentially a Republic Aviation analysis for both employee and nonemployee activity on employer property. Although sensible, her test would require an explicit reversal of Lechmere, which is not a realistic possibility in the near future. Moreover, Estlund's test would apply only where the employer pos-

---

282 See supra notes 250-275 and accompanying text.
283 See supra notes 176, 187 and accompanying text.
284 See 502 U.S. at 540.
285 Estlund, supra note 9, at 309.
286 Id. at 309, 348-49 (arguing that, to exclude protected activity from its private property, employer should be required to show "that the speakers' presence or activity would actually interfere with continuing production, the delivery of services, physical safety or security of individuals on the premises, or to provide other substantial functional justifications"); see also Sarah Korn, Note, Property Rights and Job Security: Workplace Solicitation by Nonemployee Union Organizers, 94 Yale L.J. 374, 384, 393 (1984) (arguing for rule that focuses on employer's legitimate managerial interests).
sessed a right to exclude; she would maintain the current analysis where the employer lacks that right.287 Her test, therefore, still suffers from the ills of the Board's reliance on state property law.288

To be sure, the proposal would create more uncertainty in cases where the property rights issue is clear. Yet, the questions raised in such cases are the Board's forte—unlike state property rights inquiries. More important, the current regime ignores the effect that an employer's exclusion of organizers may have on employees' freedom to exercise their labor rights. The proposal avoids that shortcoming by protecting employees from interference by even well-meaning employers.

Finally, the proposal may be implemented without changes to either the NLRA or Supreme Court precedent. That the Board has not made a consistent policy of addressing the effect of employers' conduct on employees does not mean that it cannot do so. The Board's authority to examine whether employer conduct tends to infringe employee rights is well-established.289 Indeed, the proposal's focus on employee rights is more consistent with the NLRA and Lechmere than the current analysis.290 In the end, this easily implemented change would provide better enforcement of federal labor rights and state property law, while eliminating a significant administrative problem for the Board and federal courts.

III. DOES UNION ACCESS CONSTITUTE A TAKING?

The Board's right-to-access cases have long raised the issue whether federal labor rights risk unconstitutionally taking employers' property.291 Particularly, where the Board determines that the Act provides organizers a right to access employer property, the threat of a taking is pronounced.292 Even while expanding the scope of takings, however, the U.S. Supreme Court has been careful to exclude labor 287 Estlund, supra note 9, at 343–44.

288 In Estlund's defense, the Board's reliance on state property law, and the problems associated with the analysis, were not necessarily apparent immediately after Lechmere.
289 See supra note 19.
290 See supra notes 105–107 and accompanying text.
right-to-access cases.\textsuperscript{293} The proposal here would not alter those holdings.

Although granting access to organizers obviously limits an employer's absolute authority over its property, takings jurisprudence always has acknowledged that not all regulation of property must be compensated.\textsuperscript{294} Indeed, property ownership rarely grants unfettered control, especially where other rights are at issue; as the Court emphasized in \textit{NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co.}, "[o]rganization rights are granted to workers by the same authority, the National Government, that preserves property rights."\textsuperscript{295} It is far from clear, therefore, that takings considerations are relevant in right-to-access cases.

The proposal would do nothing to alter the current right-to-access scheme's treatment under takings law. The most likely prospect of finding a physical taking remains the same under either analysis: where the Board requires unauthorized, nonemployee access to employer property because no other reasonable alternatives to communicate with employees exist. Although property rights frequently trump other rights, the NLRA's limited right-of-access requirement provides an exception under takings law.\textsuperscript{296} Federal supremacy, alone, should make NLRA restrictions on state property rights uncontroversial.\textsuperscript{297} Moreover, it has never been the case that ownership provided unlimited rights over property.\textsuperscript{298} Indeed, labor access rights are but one of many limitations on owners' autonomy over their property.\textsuperscript{299}

\begin{footnotes}
\item[293] See infra note 311 and accompanying text.
\item[295] See 351 U.S. at 112. Moreover, as Chairman Gould noted, Justice Frankfurter long ago emphasized that property rights do not control the right-to-access issue. Leslie Homes, Inc., 316 N.L.R.B. 125, 131 (1995) (Gould, Chairman, concurring) (citing Marsh v. Alabama, 326 U.S. 501, 511 (1946) (Frankfurter, J., concurring) (reversing Jehovah's Witness's criminal trespass conviction in company town)); see also Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 802 n.8 (1945) (holding that "[i]nconvenience or even some dislocation of property rights ... may be necessary in order to safeguard the right to collective bargaining") (internal quotation marks omitted); State v. Shack, 277 A.2.d 369, 373 (N.J. 1971) ("A man's right in his real property of course is not absolute.'").
\item[296] See supra notes 6-9 and accompanying text.
\item[297] See supra note 9, at 311.
\item[298] See, e.g., Winget v. Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc., 130 S.E.2d 363, 367 (S.C. 1963) (holding, in nuisance case, that "[a]n owner of property even in the conduct of a lawful business thereon is subject to reasonable limitations").
\item[299] Numerous statutes, regulations, and common-law doctrines limit a property owner's right to exclude without constituting a taking. See, e.g., \textit{Thunder Basin}, 510 U.S. at 217 n.21 (noting that mining regulations may justify limits on private property interests); \textit{Joseph William Singer, Introduction to Property} 34-39, 45-85 (2d ed. 2005) (discussing common-law and legislative public accommodation limitations); Richard R.B.
Soon after its enactment, the NLRA was interpreted to require unauthorized access to employer property under certain conditions. Some states incorporated these rulings by defining property rights as lacking a right to exclude where labor law grants access. In California, for example, it is a misdemeanor to refuse to leave private property following the owner’s request, except where state or federal labor law permits access to the property.

Perhaps reflecting this history, as well as the fact that the reasonable-alternatives exception was its own invention, the Supreme Court has expressly stated that the Board’s current right-to-access analysis does not constitute a taking. Importantly, nonemployee access under this rule is temporary and is not permitted to interfere with the owner’s, or its invitees’, use of the property. As the Court has emphasized, intrusion is allowed only to the limited extent necessary to help employees exercise their right to communicate with organizers during a representational campaign. Thus, access under the reasonable-alternatives exception is rare and the “yielding of property rights it may require is both temporary and minimal.”

The limited nature of organizers’ right to access is vital to the conclusion that it does not run afoul of the Fifth Amendment’s re-

Powell, The Relationship Between Property Rights and Civil Rights, 15 Hastings L.J. 135, 145-48 (1963) (describing examples of valid limits on property rights); Zmija, supra note 63, at 105-10 (noting employment, zoning, safety, and other types of laws that shape scope of property rights).

See supra notes 17-155 and accompanying text.

See CAL. PENAL CODE § 602(n) (West 1999 & Supp. 2006); W. VA. CODE § 61-3B-3 (2005) (exempting labor disputes from criminal trespass liability). Some of these statutes may have been a direct response to Sears and other Supreme Court cases addressing conflicts between state law and federal labor law. See Rum Creek Coal Sales, Inc. v. Caperton, 926 F.2d 353, 355-56 & n.2, 363-64 (4th Cir. 1991) (discussing West Virginia statute and comparing laws in California, Hawaii, Louisiana, and New Mexico).

CAL. PENAL CODE § 602(n).

Cf. Quietflex Mfg. Co., 344 N.L.R.B. No. 130, slip op. at 1 (June 30, 2005) (finding that employer lawfully fired employees who engaged in peaceful work stoppage in employer's parking lot because twelve-hour stoppage was too long).

Cent. Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 407 U.S. 539, 544-45 (1972) (stating also that contact can be restricted to non-work areas). As noted, the Board's current analysis has been applied since to non-organizational union activity that is directly protected, such as area standards handbilling. This extension of Babcock, however, represents more, not less, protection for employer property rights. See supra notes 73-76 and accompanying text.

Cent. Hardware, 407 U.S. at 545.
strictions on permanent, physical intrusions. The Supreme Court made this point clear in its 1980 decision in PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, in which it upheld a state prohibition against excluding expressive activity from shopping centers open to the public because, in part, the invasion of property was temporary. Although the proposal here would apply to public and non-public property, the temporary nature of the access is crucial. Even where organizers seek access to a worksite that is closed to the public—for instance, a remote logging camp—the need to protect employees’ labor rights easily fits under well-established law allowing limited, temporary intrusions onto private land. Indeed, shortly after PruneYard, the Court expressly distinguished NLRA-mandated access and permanent physical intrusions, stating that the latter constituted takings but labor access rights did not.

Organizer access also fails to constitute a taking under the Penn Central regulatory takings test: it does not deprive the owner of all economic use of the property, the economic impact of access is low, its interference with reasonable investment-backed expectations is not significant, and the character of the Board’s grant of access is confined to very limited circumstances. Moreover, the economic use of 307 See Loretto, 458 U.S. at 426, 435, 438 (holding that placing permanent cable boxes on apartment buildings was a taking); Kaiser Aetna v. United States, 444 U.S. 164, 178 (1979) (holding that permanent public access requirement for a pond connected to navigable water was a taking).

---

309 PruneYard downplayed the significance of the property’s openness, noting that past cases stressing the open nature of the property were no longer good law. Id. at 81 (citing overruling of Food Employees v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308 (1968), by Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976)) (holding that private character of store and its property does not change by being in shopping center). But see Stevens, supra note 105, at 1360–61 (suggesting that this type of access may be a taking).

310 See Shack, 277 A.2d at 373 (holding that property owner lacked right to exclude government and non-profit organizations trying to contact farmworkers living on property because it is an example of a "necessity . . . [that] may justify entry upon the lands of another" (citing 52 Am. Jur. Trespass §§ 40–41, at 867–69; 6A Am. Law of Property § 28.10, at 81 (A.J. Casner ed., 1954); William M. Prosser, Torts § 24, at 127–29 (3d ed. 1964))); cf. Lingle v. Chevron U.S.A., Inc., 544 U.S. 528, 539 (2005) (holding that regulatory takings jurisprudence "aims to identify regulatory actions that are functionally equivalent to the classic taking in which government directly appropriates private property or ousts the owner from his domain").

311 Loretto, 458 U.S. at 434 & n.11 (citing PruneYard, 447 U.S. at 84; Hudgens, 424 U.S. 507; Cent. Hardware, 407 U.S. at 545; Babcock, 351 U.S. 105) (holding that cable company’s "reliance on labor cases requiring companies to permit access to union organizers is . . . misplaced" because labor access is temporary and limited).

312 See Penn Cent., 438 U.S. at 124; accord Palazzolo v. Rhode Island, 533 U.S. 606, 617–18 (2001); supra note 63 and accompanying text.
the property is preserved because employers always may impose reasonable time, place, and manner limitations, and the NLRA will protect organizer access only if it is orderly and does not interfere with business.313 In short, access does not force an employer to shoulder a burden that the public as a whole should bear.314 Accordingly, preventing employers from excluding organizers' attempts to communicate with workers where no reasonable alternatives exist does not impose an unconstitutional burden on employers' property rights.315

The primary change under the proposal would be to impose more restrictions on the means by which employers may try to exclude non-employees. This modification, however, is less of a takings concern than the access provided under the reasonable-alternatives exception. A rule that permits employer attempts to oust organizers from what is arguably its property, but only if it does so in a peaceful manner, does not begin to approach the substantial threshold of a regulatory taking.316 Rather, the rule is similar to the numerous limitations on the use of property that do not impose unconstitutional burdens.317 If the temporary physical intrusion required under the reasonable-alternatives exception is not a taking, then the proposal's restrictions on the manner in which an employer can exclude organizing activity surely must be acceptable.318 Consequently, the proposal's limitations on private property rights do not raise a serious takings issue.

CONCLUSION.

The struggle between labor rights and property concerns has been arduous. The ascension of property law increasingly has dominated the balance between the two competing interests. The importance given to property rights, however, has resulted in a regime in 313 PruneYard, 447 U.S. at 83–84; see supra notes 194–197 and accompanying text.

315 See PruneYard, 447 U.S. at 83–84 (noting that, unlike permanent physical taking or requirement that expensive private marina must admit the public, requiring property owner to permit free speech in shopping mall did not infringe right that was "so essential to the use or economic value of their property that the state-authorized limitation of it amounted to a 'taking'" (citing Kaiser Aetna, 44 U.S. at 168, 178)).
316 See supra notes 312–314 and accompanying text.
317 See supra notes 9, 298–299 and accompanying text.
318 See Loretto, 458 U.S. at 438 (holding that potential physical taking is "qualitatively more severe than a regulation of the use of property, even a regulation that imposes affirmative duties on the owner, since the owner may have no control over the timing, extent, or nature of the invasion").
which not only is the enforcement of labor rights impaired, but vindication of property rights is hindered as well.

The proposal here attempts to rectify this situation through a logical scheme that remains consistent with the U.S. Supreme Court's right-to-access holdings. The new analysis would move the NLRB's focus away from its skewed interpretation of organizers' derivative rights, in favor of a much more traditional and appropriate concern—the employees' freedom to exercise their labor rights. Through this shift, the Board would no longer have to examine state property law, thereby eliminating delayed and often ill-conceived decisions by the Board and federal courts. Instead, those issues would be decided in the forum where they belong—state court.

Similarly, the right of employees to choose freely whether to pursue collective representation is far better served by the proposal. This fundamental goal of the NLRA often has been ignored by the Board's current analysis, under which property rights are determinative. By looking to the manner in which an employer attempts to exercise its property interests, the proposal would ensure that employees' labor rights are protected. Employees' ability to learn about unionization would also be enhanced, as coercive attempts to exclude union organizing would be prohibited, even on company property. Employers benefit as well, for they no longer have to face the choice between protecting an arguable property interest and risking a violation of the NLRA; instead, they would be free to test their property claim as long as they do so without infringing employee rights. The potential for conflict also would be alleviated, as unions that peacefully organize are assured that an employer would respond in kind or face an unfair labor practice finding.

Although state property law and federal labor law have become inexorably entwined, they are discrete interests that can be independently resolved. Whether organizing activity constitutes a trespass is a question best left to state courts, and the answer is generally unrelated to contemporaneous labor issues. Further, except in limited circumstances, the locus of the organizing does not affect the question whether the employees' labor rights were infringed. That issue requires an examination of the manner in which the employer reacted to the organizing, which the Board has inexplicably disregarded more often than not. By correcting this oversight, the proposal would offer significant benefits for the enforcement of both federal labor policy and state property rights.