Rethinking the Spoils of War: Prosecuting Rape as a War Crime in the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia

What is wonderful is that we come from all different systems and we are trying to create a system that is acceptable to all. We are doing pretty good thus far.

—ICTY Judge Gabrielle Kirk McDonald

For as long as organized human conflict has existed, the specter of wartime rape has loomed as a deplorable and historically unaddressed side effect of war. The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY), created to hear cases arising from the conflict in that war-torn area, has had occasion to pass judgment on rape and sexual assault as sanctionable criminal offenses. This Comment analyzes the ways in which the procedural and evidentiary rules governing the ICTY’s treatment of rape have been interpreted and applied in practice. It represents a close analysis of the treatment of rape by the judicial and prosecutorial arms of the ICTY through scrutiny of three cases in which sex crimes were charged and prosecuted in that international criminal court: Prosecutor v. Dusko Tadić, Prosecutor v. Aejnil Delalic, Zdravko Mucic, Hazim Delic, and Esad Landzo, and Prosecutor v. Anto Furundžija.

While scholars have extensively written in advance of the Tribunal’s deliberations on its capacity to adjudicate rape charges effectively, little in the way of primary source analysis has been done on those few cases wherein rape was actually charged, tried, and convicted under the Tribunal statute.\(^7\) This Comment weighs the substantial criticism and equally considerable praise the Tribunal has garnered concerning the treatment of rape by its rules of evidence and procedure against the actual application of those rules by the Tribunal.

I. Rape as a Weapon of War

In times of conflict, rape, whether occurring en masse or in isolated incidents, has long been employed as a weapon against female members of the adversary group.\(^5\) Viewed traditionally as one of the accepted “spoils of war,” rape for hundreds of years represented a way for wartime victors to humiliate and demoralize the vanquished.\(^9\) While rape for the most part historically has been recognized as a crime under international law, it overwhelmingly has been viewed by the international community as an inevitable product of war, and as such, has seldom been prosecuted.\(^10\) Even where gender violence has been addressed by international courts, as in the case of the Nuremberg Trials,\(^10\) the effect of widespread rape on a civilian population as well as the status of rape as a

Wartime acts of rape are calculated to shame the vanquished within their communities and give the victors a sense of power.\textsuperscript{13} Female victims of rape suffer first and foremost from its immediate physical and possible long-term psychological effects.\textsuperscript{14} These effects can be further aggravated in a wartime context when accompanied by other physical abuse, gang rapes, the death of family, and the loss of homes and possessions.\textsuperscript{15} The husbands and families of rape victims also may suffer ignominy or detachment from their communities as a result of the tremendous social stigma attached to rape in many countries.\textsuperscript{16} However, with the end of war usually comes a public desire to overcome past tragedy, and rapes are often overlooked in the rush to formulate peace agreements and divide up conquered territory.\textsuperscript{17}

In the former Yugoslavia, the use of rape as a demoralizing weapon of war became an institutionalized practice.\textsuperscript{18} Rapes were part of a “carefully conceived and effective war strategy,” used as an instrument of fear, oppression, and humiliation.\textsuperscript{19} In 1995, United Nations War Crimes Commission head M. Cherif Bassiouni estimated 12,000 instances of both reported and unreported rape in the former Yugoslavia. Catherine A. MacKinnon, who counseled several Croatian women’s organizations, set the number of rapes at 50,000 in 1992. However, speculative statistics do no justice to the types and numbers of rapes that occurred in the former Yugoslavia, as women were often repeatedly raped, gang raped, or publicly raped in front of their families or their entire community. Others were held in rape camps for months, where Serbian soldiers inflicted multiple and frequent sexual assaults on them daily. Many reports state that Serbs used forced pregnancy against Muslim rape victims as a demoralizing means of increasing the Serbian population. At the very least, Muslim rape victims feel isolated by the personal physical and emotional trauma of rape, while at worst, they may be asked to leave their communities as a result of the profound social stigma Muslim culture attaches to rape victims.

II. The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia

In a 1992 Resolution, the United Nations Security Council for the first time in history condemned the practice of wartime rape as detailed in reports of “the massive, organized and systematic detention and rape” taking place in the former Yugoslavia. Security Council Resolution 808 soon followed. Citing the findings of the U.N. Commission of Experts charged with investigating war crimes in the region, Resolution 808 expressed “grave concern” over the “treatment of Muslim women in the former Yugoslavia,” and declared that a tribunal should be established to address the problem. After seeking comments from state governments and non-governmental organizations (NGOs), the U.N. Office of Legal Affairs produced a draft statute establishing an international criminal court, which was unanimously approved by the Security Council on May 25, 1993 as Resolution 827. Expressing “grave alarm” at continuing reports of the “rape of women” in the region, this Resolution officially created the ICTY as an international body charged with “the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law” in the former Yugoslavia.

The establishment of an international criminal court is not without precedent; the international community created criminal courts after World War II to try those accused of war crimes in Germany and Japan. The U.N. has made efforts since then, especially over the last decade, to install a permanent international criminal court. The ICTY's authorizing documents continue this trend. They represent an historic step forward for the prosecution of wartime rape, due in particular to their recognition of this act as a crime worthy of sanction by the international community. Although the intentions of the U.N. were heavily debated at first, the international legal community presently appears to agree that the references to rape in the ICTY's authorizing documents demonstrate the U.N.'s recognition of rape as a war crime, as well as an intent to prosecute it as a war crime through the ICTY. Nonetheless, the prosecution of rape involves serious evidentiary and procedural difficulties, even when undertaken in peacetime settings. The ICTY has experienced such difficulties in three illustrative cases: Tadić, Delalic (commonly referred to as Celebici), and Furundžija.

III. Synopsis of Tadić, Celebici, and Furundžija

A. Prosecutor v. Tadić

The prosecutor initially indicted Dusko Tadić, a Serbian and former cafe owner, for his alleged participation in, inter alia, the repeated beating, rape, murder, and torture of detainees at the Omarska, Keraterm, and Trnopolje detention camps within Bosnia-Herzegovina. All public sessions of the Tadić trial were broadcast live within the former Yugoslavia.

Most noteworthy was the rape charge listed in the indictment. Tadić was accused of forcible sexual intercourse with a female prisoner, called by the pseudonym “F.” The prosecutor charged him with rape under each of the three aforementioned categories for causing “great suffering” and subjecting F to “cruel treatment.” Much of the confusion that still surrounds the outcome of this case arose from the form of the original indictment, which the prosecutor amended several times. The prosecution sought to amend the indictment by dropping and adding charges as evidence gradually became available.\textsuperscript{48} Technical amendments were also made to reorganize the charges in the interest of clarity, as the original indictment did not list the crimes charged by count.\textsuperscript{49} Later amendments charged Tadić with crimes against humanity for his alleged participation in the torture and rape of more than twelve female detainees.\textsuperscript{50} The prosecutor also charged Tadić with crimes against humanity for the killing and torture of Muslims and Croats in the Omarska detention camp, which included beatings and sexual mutilation.\textsuperscript{51} The procedural glitch embodied in the Prosecutor’s multiple amendments to the indictment may betray a learning curve, as Tadić was the first trial to be brought to completion in the ICTY.\textsuperscript{52}

The determinations of appropriate protective measures for witnesses made by the Tadić trial chamber stand as benchmark decisions for subsequent ICTY proceedings.\textsuperscript{53} Despite the prosecution’s offer of protective measures to Witness F, she ultimately refused to testify due to fear of reprisal.\textsuperscript{54} Further, when the cross-examiner discredited the testimony of a corroborating witness to the rape of F, the prosecutor dropped all rape charges against Tadić.\textsuperscript{55} This was a disappointment in the international legal community, as many anticipated Tadić to be the first war crimes trial in history to prosecute rape as an offense independent from the other crimes charged.\textsuperscript{56} However, the prosecutor ultimately convicted Tadić under another provision of the ICTY Statute for, inter alia, crimes of sexual violence, namely, aiding and abetting the sexual mutilation of a male Omarska prisoner, and aiding and abetting persecution, including sexual assault.\textsuperscript{57} The Tribunal sentenced him to a term of twenty years.\textsuperscript{58}

\textbf{B. Prosecutor v. Delalic and others (Celebici)}

The \textit{Celebici} indictment charged four defendants with participation in atrocities at the Celebici prison camp, where officials “killed, tortured, sexually assaulted, beat and otherwise subjected [detainees] to cruel and inhuman treatment.”\textsuperscript{59} As the first multi-defendant trial in the ICTY, \textit{Celebici} took nineteen months in total, and involved 122 testifying witnesses, 691 exhibits, and numerous decisions, orders, and interlocutory appeals.\textsuperscript{60} The ICTY acquitted only defendant Zejnil Delalic of all charges.\textsuperscript{61}

The ICTY convicted \textit{Celebici} defendant Zdravko Mucic under the doctrine of command responsibility for sex crimes that took place within his battalion, including his role in forcing two brothers to commit fellatio upon each other, and lighting a slow-burning fuse that he had tied around a male prisoner’s genitals.\textsuperscript{62} The prosecutor charged these acts as “cruel treatment” and willfully causing great suffering or serious injury.' As in Tadić, the prosecutors charged and tried sex crimes against male prisoners at Celebici along with sex crimes against women. The Tribunal sentenced Mucic to seven years in prison for his complicity in these crimes of sexual violence.

The ICTY did not find Esad Landzo guilty of any sex crimes. However, the Judgment of the Trial Chamber noted that, although the prosecutor did not charge Landzo with any sex-related assaults, he had admitted to participating in the fuse-tying and fellatio incidents. ICTY judge Karibi-Whyte expressed concern about the "depravity of mind necessary to conceive of and inflict such forms of suffering." The Judge further stated that "[i]t is most disturbing to see such propensity for violence and disregard for human life and dignity in one so young." The ICTY sentenced Landzo to fifteen years in prison for murder, torture, and submitting Celebici detainees to inhumane conditions.

The Tribunal found defendant Hazim Delic guilty of the brutal and repeated rapes of two women imprisoned in the Celebici prison camp. After interrogating his first victim, Grozdana Cecez, Delic raped her in front of two other men. "Dzajic was lying on a bed next to the window and... Cosic... remained there until [Delic] was done." She was later raped by at least five other men.

C. Prosecutor v. Anto Furundžija

In a December 10, 1998 Judgment, the Trial Chamber found defendant Anto Furundžija guilty of violations of the laws or customs of war on the basis of command responsibility for his role in the rape of Victim A in the village of Nadioci.\textsuperscript{78} Much of the testimony in this case took place in closed session due to protective measures granted by the Trial Chamber, which makes analysis of the proceedings from an evidentiary or procedural standpoint difficult.\textsuperscript{79} The Trial Chamber did find, however, that Furundžija, the local commander of a special unit of military police called "the Jokers," interrogated A.\textsuperscript{80} While he did so, another man, Accused B, threatened A by rubbing his knife along her thighs and stomach, and telling her he would put the knife inside her vagina if she failed to tell the truth.\textsuperscript{81} Then the second man raped A both vaginally and orally in the presence of Furundžija and another prisoner, Witness D.\textsuperscript{82} Forced to remain naked, A was then taken to another room, where she was again raped by Accused B in front of an audience of soldiers. Following the precedent set by Celebici, the Trial Chamber characterized the assault as an act of torture under Article 3 of the ICTY Statute, and noted that this act satisfied the elements of rape, which it based in large part on the definition established by the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) in its Prosecutor v. Akayesu decision. Furundžija was sentenced to ten years.

IV. Jurisdiction and Mandate of the ICTY

The ICTY, as an arm of the United Nations Security Council, has jurisdiction over “serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991.” In addition, the Secretary-General mandated that, in trying these crimes, the ICTY restrict itself only to application of international humanitarian law, and refrain from creating new law. In accordance with the legal principle nullem crimen sine lege—no crime without law—the Security Council expressly limited ICTY jurisdiction solely to trial and punishment for violations of recognized international law.

Presumably, an investigation and indictment of Accused B regarding these acts is forthcoming. Id. para. 81.

88 Id. at 9, 34. “Recognized” law under the ICTY Statute includes both conventional and customary law generally observed by the international community, but tension may arise regarding application of that law to countries that have not bound themselves by treaty obligations. Accordingly, the Secretary General states that the ICTY must “apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law so that the problem of adherence of some but not all States to ICTY rape prosecutions conflict with the Security Council’s mandate on a fundamental level. Although rape is recognized under an amalgam of both customary and conventional international law, no clear-cut definition of rape existed under international law prior to the genesis of the ICTY. The ICTY thus faces a unique dilemma. It has been directed, on the one hand, to try sexual assault cases under a statute that offers groundbreaking international recognition of the crime of rape. However, the ICTY’s mandate explicitly prohibits it from applying anything other than accepted definitions of international humanitarian law. Consequently, the ICTY’s interpretation of the legal gray area occupied by rape under international humanitarian law cannot help but position it in what some would call a legislative role.

The ICTY has chosen both to define rape in express terms, and to categorize it within the more internationally recognized crime specific conventions does not arise.” Id. See generally BASSIOUNI & MANIKAS, supra note 24, at 259-60 (discussing intent behind Security Council’s drafting of the ICTY Statute).

In contrast, the ICTR Statute, supra note 35, has received a fair amount of criticism regarding the scope of its jurisdiction, which some believe presents ex post facto problems. See Alvarez, supra note 7, at 2076. ICTR jurisdiction extends to Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which has never formed the basis for criminal liability in any court, and Article 4 of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Convention, which arguably does not constitute established customary international law. See id. Cf. Theodor Meron, International Criminalization of Internal Atrocities, 89 AM J. INT’L L. 554 (1995) (defending jurisdiction of the ICTR Statute on Common Article 3 grounds).

91 Report of the Secretary-General, supra note 86, at 9, para. 35.

92 In Furundžija, for example, the ICTY characterizes rape as torture and sets forth the “objective elements” of rape. See Furundžija Judgment, supra note 6, paras. 163, 185. While the ICTY bases its ruling on precedent set by Aydin, Mejia, and Akayesu, these cases themselves may not represent recognized international law. See infra notes 185-87. See also Meron, supra note 10 (presenting a useful survey of the normative development of rape and its current status under international humanitarian law).
Ultimately, the ICTY retains broad power to set precedent (and, indeed, has exercised that power) through selective application of international law. The treatment of rape by the ICTY Statute has been cited as precedent in other international judicial bodies, such as the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

A. Subject Matter Jurisdiction Over the Crime of Rape

Four categories of crimes fall under the ICTY’s jurisdiction: Article 2 deals with grave breaches of the Geneva Convention of 1949; Article 3 addresses violations of the laws or customs of war; Article 4 delineates the crime of genocide; and Article 5 recognizes crimes against humanity. To date, with the exception of genocide, express charges of rape have been brought by the ICTY Prosecutor under each of these areas.

The grave breach provisions of Article 2 apply only to armed conflicts of an international character. They include “willful killing... torture or inhumane treatment... [and] willfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health.” A nexus between the armed conflict and the alleged offense must also be shown. Additionally, to establish a grave breach, the Prosecutor must prove that the perpetrator was linked to one side of the conflict, and that the victim was a protected citizen of another nationality, as defined by Geneva Convention provisions.101 Another prosecutorial hurdle therefore consists of proving that the parties involved were on opposite sides, a burden that, if not satisfied, results in acquittal for grave breach charges.102 This is often difficult to prove in a region as politically tumultuous as the former Yugoslavia.103 Even if the parties do claim allegiance to a particular state, the government may not be recognized by the United Nations.104

Although Article 2 does not explicitly enumerate rape as a grave breach, the ICTY has interpreted this provision to include rape, both implicitly as torture,105 as well as through the application of the Additional Protocols to the Geneva Convention as customary international law.106 While the inclusion of Protocols I and II is desirable as an interpretive tool, because they both expressly prohibit rape,107 neither of the Protocols appears on the Report of the Secretary-General’s list of instruments recognized under international law.108 Nonetheless, the ICTY Trial Chamber in Celebici unequivocally recognized rape as a violation of international humanitarian law under both Protocols I and II, thus removing the Prosecutor’s burden of proving that rape may appropriately be classified as a grave breach under the ICTY Statute.

Article 3 of the ICTY Statute deals with violations of the laws or customs of war. Like the grave breach provision, Article 3 does not expressly mention rape, but instead presents a nonexclusive list which includes prohibitions against “wanton destruction of cities, towns, or villages . . . [and] plunder of public and private property.” It provides individual criminal responsibility for those engaging in violations of conventional law, customary law, or customs of war. As a codification of the Annex to the 1907 Hague Convention, Article 3 was originally interpreted to apply to international armed conflicts. Presently, however, the ICTY hold that, under Article 3, “[I]t is immaterial whether the breach occurs within the context of an international or internal armed conflict.” In addition, the prohibited acts must have been “serious” breaches involving “grave consequences,” committed against persons not involved in the hostilities.

Article 4 endows the ICTY with jurisdiction over the crime of genocide. Defined as an act “committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group,” genocidal activities under the ICTY Statute expressly include killing and the infliction of serious bodily or mental harm, but not rape. Nevertheless, the Genocide Convention, recognized in the Report of the Secretary-General as an instrument of customary international law, can reasonably be interpreted to include individual responsibility for rape. Describing rape as a form of genocide, Kelly Dawn Askin, Visiting Scholar at the Notre Dame Center for Civil and Human Rights, noted that “[w]hen sexual assault crimes are deliberately inflicted upon an ethnic group in an effort to cause that group’s destruction, wholly or partially... genocidal rape is established.” Although it seems that the Tribunal would agree, the ICTY Prosecutor has yet to try rape as genocide under Article 4. However, in an historic case, the ICTR tried and convicted former mayor Jean-Paul Akayesu of genocide for his complicity in acts of mass rape committed in Rwanda. While the international conflict and armed conflict elements required by the other Articles of the ICTY Statute are absent from the crime of genocide, proof of genocide presents other prosecutorial difficulties, such as the widespread nature of the oppression, and the fact that it need not be purely physical.

Finally, the ICTY has jurisdiction over crimes against humanity under Article 5 of the ICTY Statute. Notably, this section of the statute is the only one that expressly lists rape as a punishable offense. First formally defined in the Charter of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg, crimes against humanity include murder, torture, rape, persecution, and “other inhumane acts."\textsuperscript{127} To constitute crimes against humanity, these acts must be linked to the existence of an armed conflict, either international or internal.\textsuperscript{128} The ICTY Statute also implicitly requires that crimes against humanity arise from an official state action or policy, and that they be directed against a civilian population as part of a "widespread or systematic attack."\textsuperscript{129} Notoriously hard to prove, both of these elements require the ICTY Prosecutor in many cases to undertake extensive investigation under war-like conditions that are less than ideal for gathering and preserving evidence.\textsuperscript{130}

Other more practical concerns also plague the ICTY. As an international body and an arm of the United Nations, the ICTY frequently encounters enforcement difficulties.\textsuperscript{131} It has no true enforcement body, but can only lodge a complaint with the Security Council should it encounter noncompliance on the part of states.\textsuperscript{132} Noncompliance by the former Yugoslavia with arrests and deportations ordered by the ICTY has presented a consistent problem.\textsuperscript{133} Additionally, the ICTY relies heavily on financial support by member states.\textsuperscript{134} On a positive note, the ICTY's financial backing at present appears to be steady,\textsuperscript{135} in contrast to funding difficulties experienced in past years.\textsuperscript{136}

B. Charging Rape Under the ICTY Statute

1. Subject Matter Jurisdiction Issues

Article 3, which encompasses violations of the laws or customs of war, has been interpreted as a catch-all provision intended to cover, in residual fashion, crimes that might otherwise slip through the cracks of ICTY jurisdiction. While a catchall provision surely is a helpful tool for facilitating the prosecution of rapes that might otherwise evade recognition, the all-purpose nature of Article 3 could ultimately downplay official recognition of rape as a serious war crime worthy of international sanction. For example, isolated occurrences of rape might be classified as violations under Article 3 jurisdiction rather than as “serious” offenses constituting grave breaches under Article 2.

Further, because ICTY jurisprudence requires proof of an international armed conflict to charge a crime as a grave breach, it may inadvertently force its prosecutors to charge rape as a violation of the laws or customs of war rather than as a violation of Article 2. Indeed, recent amendments to ICTY indictments that dropped grave breach charges reflect the possibility that prosecutors have felt the impact of the heightened proof required to demonstrate the existence of an international conflict. The prosecution in Furundžija, for example, declared that it would not pursue the grave breach charges listed in the initial November 2, 137 Tadić Interlocutory Appeal, supra note 98, para. 91 (noting that “Article 3 functions as a residual clause designed to ensure that no serious violation of international humanitarian law is taken away from the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal. Article 3 aims to make such jurisdiction watertight and inescapable”); Furundžija Judgment, supra note 6, para. 14 (stating that “Article 3 is designed to ensure that the mandate of the International Tribunal can be achieved.”).

139 See ASKIN, supra note 9, at 313-14. Celebician illustrates the indeterminacy of the “serious” nature of Article 2 grave breach violations. Here, the Tribunal found defendant Hazim Delic guilty of two grave breach counts for the rapes of two different women. While the rapes could have been viewed as separate and isolated acts of violence under Article 3, the Tribunal instead charged the rapes as torture, a crime which is arguably more widely recognized as serious by the international community. See infra notes 170-214 and accompanying text for discussion of rape as torture.

1995 indictment, and the Court granted leave to withdraw that count on March 13, 1998.\textsuperscript{42} This decision most likely arose from the May 7, 1997 \textit{Tadić} Judgment, which acquitted the defendant of all grave breach charges due to the prosecution’s failure to establish beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of an international armed conflict.\textsuperscript{43}

The international armed conflict requirement was softened somewhat when, on July 15, 1999, the ICTY Appeals Chamber reversed \textit{Tadić} in part, holding that an international armed conflict did in fact exist in the region during 1992.\textsuperscript{44} The Appeals Chamber stated that because “the Trial Chamber erred in so far as it acquitted the Appellant on the sole ground that the grave breaches regime of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 did not apply,” a guilty verdict must be entered against Tadić on six counts of grave breaches.\textsuperscript{45} This decision squares the facts of the earlier \textit{Tadić} judgment with facts established in the subsequent \textit{Celebici} judgment, which found that an international conflict did exist in the former Yugoslavia throughout 1992, the period during which the offenses in both cases occurred.\textsuperscript{46} The \textit{Tadić} Appeal Decision will have slightly different repercussions for defendant Furundžija, however.\textsuperscript{47} If the Prosecutor chooses to pursue the grave breaches initially charged in \textit{Furundžija}, presumably it must try the accused for those offenses because, unlike \textit{Celebici}, the counts were withdrawn prior to trial.\textsuperscript{48}

Article 5, crimes against humanity, requires proof of rape on a mass scale or systematic basis, a much higher burden for prosecutors than that required to prove war crimes, and probably grave breaches as well.\textsuperscript{149} As a result, although rape is explicitly listed as a crime against humanity under the ICTY Statute, rape is charged more often under Articles 2 and 3 than under Article 5.\textsuperscript{150} Of the three trials involving rape which have presently been brought to completion in the ICTY, only one—Celebici—resulted in conviction for rape as a grave breach.\textsuperscript{151} More often, rape has been charged as a violation of the laws or customs of war.\textsuperscript{152} While the charges are reasonable given the specific circumstances of these cases, ICTY jurisprudence that sets the bar very high for the prosecution of rape under certain statutory provisions may have chilled prosecutorial zeal.\textsuperscript{153}

2. Individual Liability, Command Responsibility, and State Sovereignty

The Nuremberg Trials were the first international criminal proceedings based on principles of individual criminal liability.\textsuperscript{154} The ICTY continues the recent international law trend of applying criminal responsibility toward individuals rather than toward states as sovereigns.\textsuperscript{155} Under the ICTY Statute, any and all individuals, whether they are in command or carrying out orders, can be charged with war crimes.\textsuperscript{156} Further, the status of the ICTY as an international body lends legitimacy to its proceedings and subverts the criticism of “victors’ justice” that tainted the Nuremberg

The ICTY has expressed its intent to prosecute the misfeasance or knowing nonfeasance of those in command, as well as the soldier in the field who actually commits the act of rape. This approach serves two goals; it strives to match particular proscribed acts with appropriate punishment, while at the same time focusing on individuals rather than entire communities or ethnicities. ICTY Prosecutor Minna Schrag states that “[o]nly by prosecuting particular individuals, at all levels of responsibility, can we hope to persuade the victims that justice has been done. We must persuade the victims that criminal responsibility is personal to the particular person accused and should not be attributed to entire communities.”

The ICTY prosecutor has charged and tried both commanders and the commanded alike. For example, the ICTY convicted defendant Furundžija, a commander of Bosnian forces, for allowing rapes to take place under his command. The Celebici case, on the other hand, resulted in criminal liability for defendant Delic, deputy commander of the Celebici prison camp, who was sentenced for his actual participation in multiple acts of rape. The prosecution of commanders who knowingly allow or encourage their troops to commit acts of rape sends a message to the international community and to the former Yugoslavia about the ICTY’s seriousness in bringing those responsible to justice. However, if only commanders are charged, the rapists themselves remain at large within their communities. This surely offers little closure or vindication to rape victims in the former Yugoslavia, many of whom, prior to the events in question, either knew or lived among those who would become their rapists.

Nonetheless, there are advantages to trying lesser participants initially, as the ICTY did in Tadić. By selectively choosing to try “small fry” parties first, the ICTY Prosecutor has been able to “work out kinks while the stakes are not perceived to be as high,” and to “build a pyramid of factual evidence that ultimately leads upward to higher-level officials.” Additionally, the likelihood of finding eyewitnesses to testify is much higher when actual perpetrators, rather than commanders, are charged with rape.

3. Rape as Torture

The prohibition against torture has attained jus cogens status in international law. The United Nations Convention Against Torture embodies the prohibition of the international community against acts of torture. It also imposes an affirmative duty upon participating states to prevent and enforce the crime of torture and to extradite, if necessary, those who commit it.172 In two significant ICTY cases involving rape—Celebici and Furundžija—the Prosecutor sought convictions based on a characterization of rape as torture under the ICTY Statute.173 This characterization is not unheard of in international law.174

In the 1996 case of Mejia v. Peru, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights found the Peruvian State responsible for rape as torture under Article 5 of the American Convention on Human Rights.175 In its discussion of torture, the Court specified that the act must be committed: (1) with intent to inflict physical pain and suffering; (2) for the purpose of producing a certain result in the victim; (3) by a public official or a private person under the direction of such an official.176 Recognizing that “soldiers use sexual abuse as a weapon for punishing, intimidating, coercing, humiliating and degrading women,” the Court held that all of the above conditions for proving torture had been satisfied.177

In the 1997 case Aydin v. Turkey,178 the European Court of Human Rights held the Turkish State responsible for rape as a violation of the United Nations Convention against Torture.179 In doing so, the Court recognized that the severe trauma of rape “leaves deep psychological scars on the victim which do not respond to the passage of time as quickly as other forms of physical and mental violence.”180 of rape as torture under Article 3 expanded on the Akayesu judgment by proffering a definition of the "essential elements" of rape under international law.\(^{191}\) While the characterization of rape as torture represents an important step forward for international prosecution of rape, its disadvantages also deserve scrutiny.

Torture may properly be charged under each of the four subject matter jurisdiction areas of the ICTY and ICTR statutes.\(^{192}\) Therefore, construing rape as torture allows the Prosecutor greater flexibility in deciding which cases to bring. As illustrated by the recent decision in the Tadić appeal, this classification of rape may be quite helpful in light of the uncertain national status of factions within the former Yugoslavia at any given time.\(^{193}\) Certainly, the crime of torture is widely recognized and unequivocally prohibited by international instruments such as the Torture Convention,\(^{194}\) much more so than the fragmentary and inconsistent treatment of rape under international law.\(^{195}\) Further, the recognition that rape is a crime at least as severe as torture\(^{196}\) is undoubtedly a positive trend in international law. ICTY rape convictions may represent a growing international awareness of the harmful and lasting effects of rape, which could signal a movement away from historical categorizations of rape as a "private" and, therefore, unaddressed incident of war.\(^{197}\) Furundžija illustrates the ICTY’s recognition of rape as a crime sufficiently serious to warrant prosecution—

Furundžija was convicted and sentenced solely on rape charges.\textsuperscript{198}

However, disadvantages to charging rape as torture also exist. A self-evident, although fundamentally important issue, arises in cases where rape cannot be conceived of as torture; for example, where rape is not instigated by a public official.\textsuperscript{199} In other words, while rape is not always torture as defined for purposes of war, rape is always rape, and should be addressed as an individual and separate offense even if it does not meet the definition of torture under the circumstances of the particular case.\textsuperscript{200} Concerns have been voiced by feminist scholars that rape charges standing alone may be viewed by the ICTY as offenses unworthy of prosecution without additional visceral elements that would “upgrade” rape to torture.\textsuperscript{201} In Celebici, for example, the elements of torture were satisfied where women were detained, interrogated, and ultimately victimized by multiple acts of rape.\textsuperscript{202} Under ICTY jurisprudence, however, it remains unclear how and if these rapes would have been charged had the women not been detained or interrogated.\textsuperscript{203}

In contrast, a charge of torture could easily subsume a rape charge, making rape appear less important than other types of bodily injury; torture could even eradicate a rape charge where death results from the prohibited act.\textsuperscript{204} Criticism has been leveled at the ICTY Prosecutor for applying what some view as an “unreasonably high standard for torture.”\textsuperscript{205} In other words, the “interrogation by a state official” element of torture, in addition to the elements of rape, may be difficult to establish, which could result in fewer rape charges overall in the ICTY.\textsuperscript{206} Finally, while torture is widely recognized under international law, the categorization of rape as torture by the ICTY could nonetheless be viewed as "legislating from the bench," an activity that would contradict the ICTY's mandate to apply only recognized humanitarian law.\(^{207}\) In other words, even if rape is prosecuted as torture, the ICTY may not have jurisdiction over such a characterization.\(^{208}\)

On a level of principle rather than pragmatics, many critics have stressed the symbolic value of an express proscription against rape by international law.\(^{209}\) Presently, only Article 5 of the ICTY Statute (crimes against humanity) specifically lists rape as a punishable offense.\(^{210}\) Charging perpetrators for rapes defined as torture rather than defining those acts as rape may risk "implicitly enforcing the dangerous misperception that rape and other sexual abuse of women are a normal and uncontrollable product of warfare."\(^{211}\)

Overall, however, the benefits of the characterization of rape as torture in the ICTY outweigh its detriments.\(^{212}\) Although problems do exist with such a categorization, the ICTY has successfully charged, tried, and convicted defendants for the war crime of rape in an international criminal forum, an unprecedented accomplishment.\(^{213}\) The exposure and recognition of the crime of rape resulting from ICTY proceedings arguably overshadows any detrimental precedent that may have been set by categorizing rape as torture.\(^{214}\)

V. The Rules of Procedure and Evidence in the ICTY

The United States played a large role in the creation of the ICTY by helping to draft its initial statute and subsequent revisions and by influencing the Rules of Procedure and Evidence adopted by the ICTY. As a result, the structure and operation of ICTY proceedings represent a mixture of both common law and civil law tradition. As Michael Greaves, defense counsel for defendant Mucic in Celebici, accurately stated, “our Rules of Evidence and Procedure are drawn from both systems, although it might be said that the common law has had a greater input into the Rules than perhaps the civil law has.”

While the evidentiary rules of many countries are often carefully drafted to keep prejudicial or irrelevant evidence from the jury, the ICTY Rules were purposely drafted to be simple and concise in light of the fact that all ICTY proceedings are bench trials. As a result, the Rules adopt an extremely broad definition of admissibility by directing the trial chamber to “admit any relevant evidence which it deems to have probative value,” and to balance that evidence with "the need to ensure a fair trial." \(^{219}\) This balancing test, along with the absence of complex rules governing admission of out-of-court statements, allows ICTY judges a great deal of discretion in their interpretation of what constitutes relevant evidence.\(^{220}\) However, many of the standards familiar to American criminal procedure and constitutional law regarding rights of the accused, such as proof beyond a reasonable doubt, the right to cross-examine witnesses, and the right against self-incrimination, also apply in ICTY proceedings.\(^{221}\) The interpretive linchpin of the ICTY Rules, as in the American criminal justice system, is the principle of legality known as \textit{nullem crimen sine lege}, or "no crime without law."\(^{222}\) As discussed above, this principle forbids the ICTY from creating law and gives the Tribunal the authority to apply only recognized international law, a double-edged mandate, which in light of the flexibility delegated to judges to determine the relevancy of evidence, seems to both authorize and prohibit the ICTY from playing a quasi-legislative role.\(^{223}\)

The ICTY Rules have sparked both criticism and praise for their treatment of rape.\(^{224}\) The Rules contain several provisions that apply in particular to proceedings involving sexual assault.\(^{225}\) For example, specialized ICTY rules address the presentation of evidence in rape cases and provide protective measures for witnesses, while other rules establish a victims’ and witnesses’ support network within the ICTY.226 Rules with special relevance to rape cases are discussed in turn herein.227

A. Evidence of Rape in the ICTY

Rule 96 functions as the main provision dictating the presentation of evidence in sexual assault cases.228 Among other things, the Rule does not require corroboration of the testimony of rape victims.229 This is a departure from the general practice in many jurisdictions of mandating corroborating testimony in rape cases and from civil law jurisdictions in particular, where the doctrine of unus testis, nullus testis ("one witness is no witness") functions to exclude uncorroborated testimony of any kind.230 Critics have called the traditional requirement of corroborative testimony in rape cases misogynistic and insulting, and have heavily criticized this requirement for its inherent assumption that women are untruthful and more likely to fantasize than men about sexual encounters.231 Most importantly, a corroboration requirement makes rape, usually a private act, virtually impossible to prove in most cases.232 While Rule 96 removes the necessity of corroboration in ICTY rape cases, this rule in practice may nonetheless be negated by judicial concerns about sufficiency of evidence, which may result in a de facto corroboration requirement.

An example from Tadić illustrates this point. When Witness F, Tadić’s alleged rape victim, refused to testify against him, Witness L’s eyewitness testimony alone was presented to establish the rape charge.233 The Trial Chamber granted the prosecution’s motion to withdraw the protective measures for Witness L when it was discovered that he had been lying, allegedly under coercion by the Bosnian government, and it thus chose to disregard L’s testimony completely. As a result, the charge of rape against Tadić was formally withdrawn. Had L’s testimony not been debunked, Tadić may have become the first case in which the ICTY convicted an accused for rape on the basis of uncorroborated testimony.

In Celebici, at least one other witness corroborated the testimony of each rape victim. Cecez related that defendant Delic “would make me go to the front room and he raped [Milojka] in broad daylight.” She further related that Milojka “told me that... Hazim Delic raped her... he took Milojka whenever he wanted.” The Court found, based on the “supporting evidence of Ms. Cecez... and Dr. Petko Grubac, that [Antic] was subjected to three rapes by Hazim Delic.” The rape of Cecez was corroborated by Witness D, who testified that he had heard that “the guards had boasted of having raped somebody last night—you see, they had raped Gordana Cecez and some others.” A doctor at the Celebici camp also testified about his general awareness of the rapes: “when I asked (redacted) what was wrong with them she told me they were being taken out every night and raped.” The Court found Cecez’s testimony credible, as bolstered by the “supporting testimony of Witness D and Dr. Grubac... and thus concluded that Ms. Cecez was raped by Mr. Delic.”

243 Celebici Judgment, supra note 5, para. 936. The testimony of these witnesses
Although it is difficult to discern from the heavily redacted transcript of Furundžija, it appears that rape victim testimony was corroborated in that case as well. In its opening statement, the prosecution averred that “[w]hile Rule 96 does not require corroboration of the testimony of a rape victim, the Prosecution does propose to call... Witness D, who will be able to corroborate at least a part of the appalling abuses... suffered by Witness A.” The closed-session testimony of both Witness D and Witness A, the victim, is unavailable. However, after hearing all the testimony, the Court publicly noted that, although corroboration was not required under the ICTY rules, it had made a factual finding nonetheless that “evidence of Witness D does confirm the evidence of Witness A.”

Although the Rules of Evidence and Procedure unequivocally state that corroboration of rape victim testimony is not necessary, the circumstances of these cases may illustrate the existence of a de facto corroboration requirement. It remains to be seen whether the testimony of a rape victim alone, lacking corroborative testimony, would result in a positive credibility determination by the ICTY; such a case has not yet been tried. Further, even if the Trial Chamber strictly observes Rule 96 in adjudicating the credibility of rape victim testimony, the Prosecutor may be hesitant to charge rape in cases where no corroborative testimony exists to bolster the victim’s testimony. Finally, the difficulties of producing corroborative testimony multiply where the victim refuses to testify at all out of fear or shame, as is often the case with rape prosecutions generally and particularly in the former Yugoslavia. An alternative may be to introduce a limited hearsay rule for use in rape prosecutions in order to replicate the trustworthiness sought to be gained by corroboration. Such a rule would also ameliorate problems inherent to testimony about rape, such as lack of eyewitnesses and effects of psychological trauma on victims.

Rule 96 also provides a limited consent defense. To present a defense of consent in the ICTY, a defendant must present relevant and credible evidence in camera to show that the victim was not subjected to or threatened (or reasonably believed she would be threatened) with violence, duress, or detention. A failure to carry this burden results in a finding of coercive circumstances, which in turn gives rise to a reputable presumption against consent. The consent defense is a much-debated and contentious aspect of rape prosecutions in criminal law. Although a preliminary draft of Rule 96 stated that in rape proceedings, “consent shall not be allowed as a defense,” a revised consent defense was reinstated after fair trial concerns arose from the complete denial of the defense to the accused.

However, in light of the circumstances surrounding rape cases in the former Yugoslavia, it is difficult to fathom how consent could ever be a contested issue, as many rape victims were detained against their will in camps or raped at gun or knifepoint. Indeed, the defense has not arisen in any of the rape cases adjudicated in the ICTY to date. Rape victim Ramic in Tadić told the Trial Chamber that a man named Kicanovic “knocked me down and raped me in the corridor,” threatening that “if I told about this to anybody he would come back and kill me.”

Celebici detainee Cecez described the circumstances surrounding her rape as follows: “they took my freedom then... they would lock us up from the outside.” During the rape, Cecez said she “could not do anything... I had no way of defending myself... I was crying.” Rape victim Antic in Celebici told the court “[Delic] pointed the rifle at me. I got scared. I was afraid he would kill me. So I had to do what he asked... I had to take my clothes off...” Witness A in Furundžija was interrogated at knifepoint and then repeatedly raped after being “arrested and detained by the jokers.”

Undoubtedly, consent to rape in the context of this chaotic and war-torn country is a non-issue in the overwhelming majority of ICTY cases. Thus, while abrogation of the defense would be ideal for rape prosecutions, the likelihood that it will ever present a serious issue for adjudication is remote.

Rule 96 also contains a rape shield provision, which, similar to Rule 412 of the Federal Rules of Evidence of the United States, bars evidence in any form of the victim’s prior sexual conduct. Like the consent defense, however, evidence of prior sexual history will most likely not present a justiciable issue in the types of rape cases emerging from the former Yugoslavia.

B. Protective Measures for Witnesses

Nobody disputes the need for a high level of protection for ICTY witnesses, as many witnesses have been coerced into testifying falsely, or into not testifying at all, and victimized by physical or sexual assaults or death threats. Additionally, in light of the tumultuous circumstances and tremendous stigma attached to rape within the former Yugoslavia, many victims from that area refused to testify unless the ICTY agreed to give witnesses stringent physical protection from the defendant and his military counterparts not in custody, as well as suppression of identity from the public. The Special Rapporteur for U.N. Human Rights Committee noted that fear, trauma, and shame experienced by rape victims may cause a reluctance to testify. Fear and shame have caused some witness-victims to decline to testify in the ICTY, even after being promised protective measures by the ICTY Prosecutor.

Several of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence function together to provide witnesses testifying before the ICTY the protection mandated by Article 22 of the ICTY Statute. Rule 69 explains the circumstances under which the Prosecutor may ask the Trial Chamber for protective measures. For example, where “exceptional circumstances” are present, the Trial Chamber may order non-disclosure of the identity of the witness. Protective measures may conceal witness identity even from the defendant in exceptional circumstances. Rule 75 lists specific avenues 275 The Tribunal used this provision to withhold the identity of most of the witnesses from the defendant in Tadić. See Tadić Decision on Protective Measures, supra note 53. This practice, however, raises concerns of fairness to the defendant. See generally Green et al., supra note 200 (proposing that only in the “most extreme cases” should the Tribunal have authority to shield witness identity from the defendant and the available to the Court for witness protection, "provided that the measures are consistent with the rights of the accused." These include redaction of the record, suppression of witness identity or whereabouts, assignment of pseudonyms, and closed sessions. The Court may, in its discretion, hold an in camera hearing to determine whether these protective measures are needed. It may also, under Rule 75, safeguard witnesses during their testimony, by controlling the "manner of questioning to avoid any harassment or intimidation."

An analysis of ICTY transcripts reveals that the Court treats protected witnesses with due concern. Before the witnesses in Celebici began their testimony, the Trial Chamber judge confirmed that each of them was testifying under protective measures by asking, "you have requested that your name and identity not be released to the public?" The Celebici Trial Chamber utilized Rule 75 during the cross-examination of rape victim Antic, when counsel for defendant Mucic attacked Antic's credibility on cross-examination, asking her if she had "simply invented" parts of her testimony, and suggesting that the account of a conversation she related on direct was "a lie." Judge Jan chastised the defense, saying "[d]o not use the word 'lie.' Use a less-milder word." Judge Karibi-Whyte had previously warned defense counsel that his questions were "amounting to harassment."

The Decision of the Trial Chamber in Tadić sets forth the ICTY standard for determining the necessity of protective

It addresses the practice of withholding witness identities from the public, the prevention of re-traumatization of victims, and the propriety of allowing the testimony of witnesses to be anonymous to the defendant. The need for protective measures in Tadić was great because the entire trial was broadcast live on Bosnian television. In its confidentiality determination, the Court undertook a comparative legal analysis of both common law and civil law states and concluded that a balancing test was appropriate under Rule 79. Confidentiality is thus granted by the ICTY under Rule 79 when the need for witness protection involving special circumstances, such as sexual assault, outweighs the interest in giving the defendant a fair and public hearing.

In addition to the witness protection/fair trial balancing test, the Court also granted complete anonymity to certain prosecution witnesses through the use of a five-part test. First, the witness or his or her family must face an objectively real fear for their safety. Second, the testimony of the particular witness must be so “important” to the Prosecutor’s case that it would be unfair to proceed without it. Third, there must be no prima facie evidence that the witness is untrustworthy, such as an extensive criminal background. Fourth, the inability of the ICTY to shroud witness identification through a comprehensive witness protection program must be considered. Finally, the measures taken must be “strictly necessary.”

Following the five-part test described in the Tadić Decision on Protective Measures, the Trial Chamber in Celebici granted requests for various types of protective measures for witnesses. The court allowed numerous witnesses to testify under pseudonyms. The identities of Witnesses D and F were concealed from the public through video distortion of their faces. Celebici witnesses B and F gave eyewitness testimony concerning sexual assaults at the Celebici camp from behind a one-way screen, through which only the defendant, not the witness, could be seen. The court allowed other witnesses to testify by means of video link due to serious medical problems that prohibited them from traveling to the Hague.

Pursuant to Rule 75, the Furundžija Court granted closed-session proceedings for key witnesses, including the rape victim. In addition, all testimony by unprotected witnesses that included identifying facts about the victim was taken in closed session. As the prosecution put it, "[c]losed session is the only way to appropriately ensure that there are no statements that can be linked to Witness A if she is later identified, which we think is very possible."

Faced with this predicament, the Trial Chamber decided to remove the majority of the proceedings in Furundžija from public

Because the Court did not want to reveal any information about the victim that might lead to disclosure of her identity, it could not publish the rationale underlying its decision to allow closed proceedings for the entirety of Witness A’s testimony. This problematic situation places the defendant’s right to a public trial in question and removes judicial determinations of protective measures from the public scrutiny they would otherwise be afforded. Further, the ICTY gives judges a large amount of discretion to decide appropriate protective measures, and the Tribunal rarely refuses requests for protective measures due to the highly publicized nature of the proceedings.

Despite the best efforts of the ICTY, identifying information about protected parties often leaks out due to the massive amount of testimony and victims involved. For example, a critical error occurred in the Celebici trial transcript when a witness mentioned in open court the names of parties who had been offered confidentiality. Although a motion was later made to redact the names from the transcript, the names were mistakenly never removed.

The ICTY has experienced difficulties in its efforts to locate witnesses and transport them to the Hague. Chief Prosecutor Louise Arbour cites obtaining witnesses from around the world as one of the major obstacles in ICTY investigations and proceedings. Defense counsel Michail Wladimiroff tells of his experiences in investigating the indictment of Dusko Tadić:

I was in the area of the opština of Prijedor... when I had to leave... because of the NATO bombing... It is a war zone nowadays and, therefore, it is not possible for me to go into the area... we are terribly handicapped and, therefore, not able to

Under Rule 40, "the Prosecutor may ameliorate such circumstances, in the interest of providing a fair trial, by requesting states to take all necessary measures to prevent... injury to or intimidation of a victim or witness."\textsuperscript{311} Fair trial concerns arose in Tadić, however, because the defense was hindered in its attempts to protect witnesses, many of whom were located within the former Yugoslavia, while most of the Prosecution witnesses were living outside the area.\textsuperscript{312}

The ICTY's proposed balance between fair trial and witness protection concerns has been compromised at times by logistical problems regarding the order of presentation of witnesses.\textsuperscript{313} Witnesses, many of whom have traveled a great distance to reach the Tribunal, often have been delayed from testifying for days.\textsuperscript{314} In such circumstances, the ICTY must balance concerns about the fear, stress, and possible retraumatization of witnesses who may be victims of sexual assault against the defense's need to prepare for effective cross-examination of such witnesses.\textsuperscript{315}

For examples, in Celebici, when tired defense counsel asked for early adjournment and continuation of cross-examination until the next day, the Prosecution objected, expressing a desire to finish cross-examination immediately.\textsuperscript{316} The Prosecutor, who had "only recently... learned how serious the problems were," was attempting to expedite the testimony of victim Milokja Antic, who, as a victim of sexual assault, was in a vulnerable state and had been waiting because the trial was behind schedule.\textsuperscript{317} The Trial Chamber nevertheless decided to adjourn and allowed the defense to continue cross-examination the next day, reasoning that "some of the accused persons have greater difficulty at this stage." Later in the Celebici proceedings, the delay resulting from a contempt hearing even forced the prosecution to send home several witnesses who had been waiting to testify.

The solution cited by many critics to ICTY witness protection problems is to establish an ICTY witness relocation program. Because the prosecution depends heavily on witness testimony as one of its few sources of evidence, the testimony of rape victims can make or break a case. If victims were offered the permanent protection of relocation, they might be more likely to testify. In addition, elaborate witness protection measures would not need to be as readily employed by the Tribunal, thereby minimizing concerns of fair trial and unfettered judicial discretion. According to the ICTY, a program to relocate witnesses to states that have agreed to accept them is "still in its nascent stages."

victims with a supportive and responsive legal ear in order to encourage reporting of rapes.\textsuperscript{327} The Unit also makes arrangements for travel and accommodation of witnesses and provides around-the-clock information and assistance.\textsuperscript{328}

The defense in\textit{Celebici} criticized the Victims and Witnesses Unit for limiting access to prosecution witnesses: "A connection . . . exists between the Victims and Witnesses Unit and the Office of the Prosecutor that is improper."\textsuperscript{329} The Court, citing delay by the defense, allowed the witnesses to take the stand without first allowing the defense a chance to interview them, reasoning that the defense would have adequate opportunity to cross-examine.\textsuperscript{330} One is left to wonder if, in the ICTY, equal access to witnesses is an essential part of the right of the accused to a fair trial, as mandated by Article 21 of the ICTY Statute.\textsuperscript{331}

Rule 34 also provides that "[d]ue consideration shall be given, in the appointment of staff, to the employment of qualified women."\textsuperscript{332} This provision illustrates a larger ICTY recognition of the serious negative effects of rape and the importance of female staff capable of addressing those effects through the Victims and Witnesses Unit.\textsuperscript{333} The United Nations Secretary-General advised that qualified women be appointed to the ICTY at all levels to respond to "the sensitivities of victims of rape and sexual assault."\textsuperscript{334} Indeed, women do maintain a strong presence on the Tribunal: two women sit as Tribunal judges, the Chief Prosecutor is a woman, and of the three-member prosecution team who tried Furundžija, two were women.\textsuperscript{335}

of an international criminal tribunal did not intend the Victims and Witnesses Unit or the ICTY to be a vehicle for victors’ justice, some rape victims who testify may not receive the closure or vindication they would like.336 However, the increased reporting spurred by the Victims and Witnesses Unit undoubtedly benefits rape victims by allowing them the chance to tell their stories, thereby promoting discussion and facilitating understanding within the victims’ communities.337

D. Compensation of Victims

The ICTY Statute offers restitution as a penalty, authorizing the Tribunal to order “return of any property and proceeds acquired by criminal conduct.”338 Rule 105 further details these restitutionary measures.339 However, the Rules do not offer compensation beyond such restitutionary measures.340 Rule 106 specifies that the ICTY may notify the states involved of the criminal liability incurred by defendants, and that the “final and binding” judgment of the Tribunal may be utilized by a victim who wishes to “bring an action in a national court or other competent body to obtain compensation.”341 The Tribunal thus does not constrain victims seeking civil remedies in domestic courts, pursuant to Security Council Resolution 827, which instructs that “the work of the International Tribunal shall be carried out without prejudice to the right of the victims to seek, through appropriate means, compensation for damages incurred as a result of violations of international humanitarian law.”342

Critics have pointed out that the ICTY could do more to provide victims with compensation. The ICTY could interpret Resolution 827 to require the Tribunal to undertake what would amount to civil proceedings coterminous with its determination of criminal liability. Indeed, many Bosnian rape victims, especially those who are already reluctant to testify in a criminal matter, could benefit from such a determination, as they may show even more unwillingness to litigate their case in yet another proceeding. However, the ICTY’s already strained resources make it difficult for the Court to undertake proceedings beyond the adjudication of criminal liability. Further, rape victims of the former Yugoslavia have already begun to pursue compensation in other forums. For many more victims, criminal sanctions provided by the ICTY may be sufficient vindication.

E. Punishment/Sentencing

The ICTY imposes sentences by taking into account the domestic law of the state of which the defendant is a citizen. The Tribunal is authorized, for example, to take into account the “general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia,” and other punishments imposed on the convicted party by individual States for the same criminal act, along with any aggravating or mitigating factors. Sentencing practices of the former Yugoslavia set the maximum prison term at twenty years and structure sentencing so that a penalty derived from the combination of several sentences cannot exceed the term of the single longest sentence.\footnote{352}{Id.}

In the Tadić, Celebici, and Furundžija cases, the Court imposed concurrent sentences on each of the convicted parties.\footnote{353}{Murphy, supra note 138, at 91-92. Some critics advocate broad ICTY discretion to impose stricter sentences than those used in the former Yugoslavia: “Rape and forced prostitution are explicitly listed as war crimes and are, therefore, subject to much greater penalty than the ten-year maximum applied to rape as a domestic crime.” Green et al., supra note 200, at 210.} Tadić was found guilty of several counts, the sentences for each of which were imposed concurrently, with the longest being twenty years.\footnote{354}{1997 Tadić Sentencing Judgment, supra note 58, para. 74.} He is currently serving that time under a mandate from the Tribunal that his sentence not be commuted to less than ten years.\footnote{355}{Id. Arguments for and against the imposition of more stringent rape sentences are numerous. On the one hand, the indictment, trial, and conviction of those who commit rape on an individual or mass scale represent an enormous step forward for women's rights at the international level. International awareness of the crime of rape, now also recognized as occurring in Kosovo, has arguably never been more intense. Exposure of the international community to the war crime of rape may be instrumental in “helping to break the endless cycle of violence and retribution” occurring in the former Yugoslavia, and elsewhere. The often very public nature of ICTY trials may offer deterrent value to those who might commit such crimes in the future.

However, it is difficult to deny that ICTY sentencing seems lenient, especially given the magnitude of the atrocities attributed to many defendants. Chief Prosecutor Louise Arbour noted that the ICTY will be ineffectual as a deterrent should it fail to bring more high-ranking officials to justice. It remains to be seen if the ICTY can truly have deterrent effect, given the scope of the ongoing conflict in the former Yugoslavia and the sheer number of perpetrators whose battle tactics have involved rape. Certainly, balancing the interest in documentation and recognition of rape as a weapon of war with the basic criminal law goals of retribution and deterrence is no simple task. In sentencing perpetrators of war crimes, the Tribunal continually struggles to weigh humane and proportional punishment against a growing international

\textit{F. Interpretation/Translation in the ICTY}

Descriptions of the speed and volume of testimony undergoing translation during any given instant in the ICTY are staggering.\textsuperscript{371} Parties wear earphones, into which simultaneous translation is given in at least three different languages, depending on the fluency of the parties present.\textsuperscript{372} A simultaneous transcript appears on monitors placed on each desk in the courtroom, where parties can read it and watch for inaccuracies.\textsuperscript{373} Although issues surrounding translation in the courtroom are not specific to rape proceedings, a close reading of ICTY transcripts reveals that their effect on rape trials does bear mentioning.

The presence of a foreign language interpreter in the courtroom necessarily adds delay and intrudes upon the normal linguistic and procedural flow of the events taking place.\textsuperscript{374} Interpreters can unintentionally interfere with testimony—evidence that attorneys religiously seek to control—by exerting a coercive power through rephrasing and interruptions.\textsuperscript{375} These types of inadvertent influences happen quite often in ICTY proceedings, due to the multilingual nature of the proceedings and the linguistic needs of the parties.\textsuperscript{376}

The two official languages of the ICTY are English and French.\textsuperscript{377} However, the ICTY Statute dictates that the accused has the right to be promptly and completely informed of the charges against him or her in a language he or she understands, and that an interpreter is to be provided at no cost if the accused cannot speak or understand the languages used in the Tribunal.378 Under Rule 76, ICTY interpreters take a solemn oath to perform all duties faithfully, impartially, and confidentially, and to observe the ICTY Interpreters’ Code of Ethics.379

\textsuperscript{370} See, e.g., Furundžija Judgment, \textit{supra} note 6, at para. 290 (the Trial Chamber discusses the difference between the fact of punishment and the severity of sanction and recognizes that, for the ICTY, "penalties are made more by its international stature, moral authority and impact upon world public opinion.").

The Trial Chamber in Tadić warned the parties at the outset of the trial to “speak slowly, because sometimes the interpreter needs additional time.”380 The delay caused by interpretation may negatively affect witnesses who have traveled to the Hague to testify. The feelings of fear and stress already felt by many rape victims may be heightened as testimony is delayed.381 Further, certain witnesses needing special interpreters sometimes require rescheduling of testimony. The defense counsel interrupted proceedings in Celebici, for example, when it sought to change the order of witnesses in order to accommodate the Arabic interpreter required by his witness: “I would like to . . . interpose a witness . . . The witness speaks Arabic and we do not have Arabic interpreters in house and special provision has been made to bring them in.”382

Where speed and duration of translation are intense, the possibility for human error naturally increases.383 The prosecution in Tadić noted that:

there is also the issue of multiple languages and the imprecision of the interpretation process. . . . [A] great deal of accuracy is bound to be lost in the translation process. There is no statement taken during the course of the investigation that will be a verbatim report of what the witnesses say.384

Parties bear the responsibility to check the transcripts for accuracy and make objections as soon as errors are discovered: "[t]he attorneys who speak both English and Bosnian have noticed many errors in the translation which change the meaning. . . . [T]he answer given on several occasions changed not only the names of people and places but also the very substance of what the witness was saying." The ICTY corrects typographical errors brought to its attention but does not accept stylistic changes. In Tadić, for example, Judge McDonald noted one such instance where the transcript had been corrected: "last time . . . I think the transcript read 'released' and it should have been . . . '[a]rrests.'"

Listeners at times have trouble understanding the translation through their headphones—often in ICTY proceedings, the questions asked of witnesses, as well as their answers, are translated by the same person. As a result, there is no audible differentiation in the speaker's voice to indicate where the question of one speaker ends and the answer of the other speaker begins, which can lead to confusion on the part of the listeners. Judge Jan halted proceedings during the testimony of rape victim Cecez in Celebici to explain that "the interpreter is the same, so the questions and the answers really get muddled up. . . . Getting the same voices in quick succession, it is very difficult to make out what the question is and what the answer is."

Translation problems arise even when the examining attorney speaks the same language as the witness. Because these parties understand each other without the aid of translation, they tend to speak much faster, making it difficult for the interpreters to keep pace with them. In the Furundžija transcript, for example, the interpreter interrupts constantly to ask the speakers to slow down, especially during presentation of expert testimony crucial to the Court's understanding of the effects of Post-Traumatic Stress.

Disorder on rape victims.\textsuperscript{392} Translating the ICTY proceedings requires interpreters to make quick and definitive choices daily, even hourly, between analogous words, phrases, and linguistic idioms.\textsuperscript{393} These swiftly made decisions ultimately affect the meaning of the testimony, and unfortunately may at times be tainted by human error, fatigue, or stress.\textsuperscript{394} The need to check constantly for accuracy in the testimony appearing on courtroom monitors distracts attorneys and judges.\textsuperscript{395} Technological glitches can bring the entire proceeding to a halt.\textsuperscript{396} In short, interruptions and errors focus attention on the linguistic mode of production rather than on the testimony itself.\textsuperscript{397} Undoubtedly, interpretation and translation problems have at times interfered with the overall impact of rape victim testimony and the presentation of evidence of rape.\textsuperscript{398} However, no feasible alternatives exist. Ironically, the multinational and multilingual character of the ICTY, while acting as an international safeguard against unduly biased proceedings, may also be the very thing that sometimes hinders its search for truth.\textsuperscript{399}

\textbf{VI. Alternatives to the ICTY for Rape Victims}

The ICTY lacks the resources to address each and every injury arising from the conflict in the former Yugoslavia.\textsuperscript{400} However, alternative remedies in other fora are available to rape victims.\textsuperscript{401} Remedies may be pursued in domestic Bosnian courts, for example, where litigation could have a more immediate effect on the local community.\footnote{alvarez, supra note 7, at 2095 (noting possibility of domestic proceedings, but advocating international criminal proceedings as superior due to current fragmented status of Balkan government and small likelihood of evenhanded treatment).} Domestic courts may be limited by their own political agendas, which, in the case of rape in the Balkans, often do not hold victims’ concerns as paramount.\footnote{see askin, supra note 47, at 99.} However, a domestic judicial body might be more representative of the goals of citizens within the particular State and certainly would possess expertise in applying its own law to the case at hand.\footnote{see alvarez, supra note 7, at 2097.}

Truth Commissions could also bring closure to rape victims in the former Yugoslavia by providing a means for the compilation and dissemination of information about the regional conflict in a non-adversarial manner.\footnote{truth commissions are a recording mechanism, designed not to inflict legal punishment but as “a kind of non-adversarial process of re-establishing democratic justice by exposing the truth of what happened.” alvarez, supra note 7, at 2100 (quoting anne sa’adah, Germany’s Second Chance: Trust, Justice, and Democratization (forthcoming fall 1998, manuscript at 232, on file with author). see also coonan, supra note 336, at 253 (describing the ICTY “super-indictment” procedure under Rule 61). Functioning much like a miniature truth commission, the ICTY, under certain circumstances, can make indictment information on the accused publicly available.} A truth commission could increase international awareness of rape through exposing to public scrutiny specific occurrences of the crime within the former Yugoslavia.\footnote{alvarez, supra note 7, at 2100.} While they may risk jeopardizing the anonymity sought by the ICTY in certain indictments, truth commissions could promote awareness and vindicate victims by allowing them an opportunity to tell their stories to the world.\footnote{see 1998 ICTY Annual Report, supra note 131, para. 225 (discussing ICTY reservations about the creation of a Truth and Reconciliation Commission for Bosnia and Herzegovina).}

The International Court of Justice (ICJ), on the other hand, could foster public debate and solidarity within the former Yugoslavia through proceedings against states as entities.\footnote{see alvarez, supra note 7, at 2099.} Concerns about derogation of state sovereignty, intimidation of witnesses, and the minimal impact of individual criminal liability could be assuaged by ICJ proceedings that pit state against state.\footnote{see bassiouni & manikas, supra note 24, at 244-45.}
For example, the ICJ could ultimately act as a safety valve for the expression of public outrage in Bosnia by providing a forum for that country's legal dispute not with individual citizens, but with the Serbian and Montenegrans states themselves.\textsuperscript{410}

Another remedy for rape victims exists in United States Federal District Court under the Alien Tort Claims Act, amended in 1992 as the Torture Victim Protection Act.\textsuperscript{411} Some see civil damages levied against individual rapists as a more effective punishment, for both victim vindication and deterrence, than imprisonment.\textsuperscript{412} Indeed, two of the first cases to be brought under that Act, \textit{Doe v. Karadzic}\textsuperscript{413} and \textit{Kadic v. Karadzic},\textsuperscript{414} were filed by Muslim women seeking damages for various acts of sexual violence that occurred during the disintegration of the former Yugoslavia.\textsuperscript{415} These types of suits help cultivate international awareness of the war crime of rape, but even if they are successful, the plaintiffs will likely face problems in enforcing judgments.\textsuperscript{416}

Each of these alternative courses of action for remedy poses potential problems for rape victims. While the ICTY exists for the specific purpose of reconciliation through adjudication of the guilt of those accused of committing war crimes and to impose criminal sanctions on those found guilty,\textsuperscript{417} criminal sanctions do not always offer the types of vindication desired by individual victims.\textsuperscript{418} As \textsuperscript{415} The two cases were consolidated in a motion to dismiss. See Doe v. Karadzic, 866 F. Supp. 734 (S.D.N.Y. 1994). On appeal, Circuit Judge Jon O. Newman remarked on the unusual nature of this case in the first sentence of his opinion: “[M]ost Americans would probably be surprised to learn that victims of atrocities committed in Bosnia are suing the leader of the insurgent Bosnian-Serb forces in a United States District Court in Manhattan.” Kadic v. the Tribunal itself remarked, "[f]or the abused, forgiveness is possible only when they know, and exceptionally, understand, the reasons for their suffering. For the abusers, forgiveness is possible only when they accept accountability." While this may be true in a substantial number of cases, even the ICTY itself would admit that there are as many different conceptions of reconciliation and responsibility as there are factions within the former Yugoslavia.

VII. Conclusion

Although it has accomplished a great deal, the ICTY still has much work ahead of it. Alleged perpetrators of some of the most egregious acts of violent rape in the former Yugoslavia, Mladic and Karadzic, have yet to be apprehended. The Foca Indictment is the first ICTY indictment to charge suspects solely with crimes of rape and sexual assault as offenses independent of other acts of violence, has the potential to set international precedent and signal a new era of international recognition of rape as a war crime, it has yet to go to trial. The criminal prosecution of rape as a war crime by an international body is historic and represents perhaps the single largest contribution to international humanitarian law by the ICTY. However, the Tribunal cannot survive without the international financial support, apprehension assistance, and enforcement of judgments that states currently provide.\footnote{See id.}

The international nature of the Tribunal helps to insulate it from accusations that it administers a biased "victor's justice," while the consent and support of various independent sovereign states serve to validate the goals and activities of the Tribunal.\footnote{See id. para. 3.} However, the international character of the ICTY functions as its Achilles heel as well, through language translation, evidence gathering, and witness transportation, presenting enormous and inevitable challenges to the adjudication of criminal liability.\footnote{See supra notes 371-99, 268-324, 308-10, and accompanying text.} These challenges are sure to continue in light of the Tribunal's recent indictment of those involved in atrocities in Kosovo.\footnote{See Prosecutor v. Milosevic et al., Case No. IT-99-37 (May 24, 1999), http://www.un.org/icty/indictment/english/mil-ii990524e.htm; \textit{Morning Edition: Milosevic Indicted for Kosovo War Crimes} (National Public Radio Broadcast, May 27, 1999), available at LEXIS, News File.} The mission undertaken by the United Nations is to bring war criminals to justice by exposing them to the scrutiny of the international community.\footnote{See supra notes 28-42 and accompanying text.} The International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia has adhered to the goals of this truthseeking mission as well, by questioning its own methods and asking for assistance where appropriate, while accepting the challenges of international prosecution and expressing a willingness to address its own shortcomings.
